upanishad (ō-pan'i-shad), n. [Skt.] In San- skrit lit., a name given to a series of treatises of theosophic and philosophic contents. They are of different dates. They exhibit the earliest attempts of the Hindu mind to penetrate into the mysteries of creation and existence.

An upanishad is a passage of more philosophic or the-osophic character, an excursus into a higher and freer region of thought, away from the details of the ceremonial and their exposition.

Whitney, Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 1.

upas (ū'pas), n. [= F. upas, < Malay (Java)

upas, poison; in the Celebes and Philippine Islands ipo or hipo.] 1. The poisonous sap of different trees of the Malayan and Philippine Islands, more or less used for arrow-poison. The upas-antiar is yielded by the antiar or upas-tree. (See def.
2 and antiar.) The upas tieut, or upas radia, is from the chettik or tjetek, Strychnos Tieut, one of the strychnine- trees.

2. The tree Antiaris toxicaria, one of the large-est Javanese trees, having a cylindrical stem 60 or 70 feet high below the branches. Upon incision a poisonous milky juice flows from the trunk, concreting into a gum, which is mixed with the seed of Capsicum frutescens and various aromatic substances to form one kind of arrow-poison. The action of the poison is first purgative and emetic, then narcotic, destroying life by tetanic convulsions. Fable invests this tree with a deadly influence upon whatever comes under its branches. It is true that when the tree is felled or the bark extensively wounded it exhales an effluvia producing cutaneous eruptions; otherwise the upas may be approached and ascended like other trees. See Antiaris and sack-tree.

Fierce in dread silence, on the blasted heath,
Fell upas sits, the hydra-tree of death.
Erasmus Darwin.

3. Figuratively, something baneful or pernicious from a moral point of view: as, the upas of drunkenness.

2. One who assumes a lofty or arrogant tone.—3. A puddle made by the hoofs of horses in clayey ground. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.].—

4. The meadow-saffron, Colchicum autumnale, whose flowers spring up suddenly without leaves.

II. a. 1†. Starting up suddenly; quickly rising.

With upstart haire and staring eyes dismay.

Spenser, F. Q., III. x. 54.

2. Suddenly raised to prominence or consequence; parvenu: as, "a race of upstart creatures," Milton, P. L., ii. 834.

New, up-start Gods, of yester-dayes device.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Decay.

An upstart institution so totally unassisted by secular power and interest. Eccllyn, True Religion, II. 128.

3. Characteristic of a parvenu; new and pretentious.

Think you that we can brook this upstart pride?

Marlowe, Edward the Second, i. 4.

The wronged landscape coldly stands aloof,

Refusing friendship with the upstart roof.

Lowell, Fitz Adam's Story.

upstay (up-stä'), v. t. To sustain; support. Milton, P. L., ix. 430.

upstep (up-step'), v. i. To step up; move upward. Hynd Horn (Child's Ballads, IV. 26).

upstir (up'stēr), n. Commotion; tumult; insurrection. Sir J. Cheke, The Hurt of Sedition.

upstream (up-strēm'), v. i. To stream, flow, or flame up: as, upstreaming flames.

up-stream (up'strēm'), prep. phr. as adv. Toward the higher part of a stream; against the current: as, to row up-stream.

up-stream (up'strēm'), prep. phr. as a. [< up-stream, adv.] Of or pertaining to the upper part of a stream; moving against the current.

An up-stream wind increases the surface resistance.

Gar. Report on Miss. River, 1861 (rep. 1876), p. 270.

up-street (up'strēt'), prep. phr. as adv. At or toward the higher part or upper end of a street.

upsun (up'sun), n. The time during which the sun is above the horizon; the time between sunrise and sunset. Fountainhall. (Imp. Dict.)

upswarm (up-swärm'), v. I. intrans. To rise in swarms; swarm up.

Upswarming show'd

On the high battlement their glittering spears.

Cooper, Iliad, xii.

II. trans. To cause to rise in a swarm or swarms; raise in a swarm. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 2. 30.

upsway (up-swä'), v. t. To sway or swing up; brandish. [Rare.]

That right-hand Giant 'gan his club upsway.

Scott, Vision of Don Roderick, The Vision, st. 16.

up-sweep (up'swēp'), n. A sweeping upward: as, the up-sweep of a curve; the up-sweep of an arch. [Rare.]

upswell (up-swel'), v. i. To swell up; rise up. Wordsworth, Ode, 1814.

upsyturvy (up-si-ter'vi), adv. [A variation of topsyturvy, substituting up for top.] Upside down; topsyturvy. [Rare.]

There found I all was upsy turvy turn'd.

Greene, James IV., iii. 3.

uptails-all (up'tälz-äl), n. Confusion; riot; hence, revelers. (Davies.)

uptake (up-tāk'), v. t. 1. To take up; take into the hand. Spenser, F. Q., II. ii. 11.—2†. To succor; help.

The right hond of my iust man uptook thee.

Wyclif, Isa. xli. 10.

uptake (up'tāk'), n. [< uptake, v.] 1. The act of taking up; lifting.

To this ascensional movement (in cyclones) undoubtedly must be attributed the rain and cloud which we find there—rain near the centre, where the ascensional impulse is strongest; cloud round the outside, where the uptake is less strong. Science, XI. 215.

2. Perceptive power; apprehension; conception: as, he is quick in the uptake. Scott, Old Mortality, vii. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—3. The upcast pipe from the smoke-box of a steam-boiler, leading to the chimney.—Gleg at the uptake. See gleg.

uptaker (up-tāk'er), n. [ME., < uptake + -er.] A helper; a supporter. Wyclif, Ps. lxxxviii.

uptear (up-tār'), v. t. To tear up. Milton, P. L., vi. 663.

upthrow (up-thrō'), v. t. To throw up; elevate.

upthrow (up'thrō'), n. [< upthrow, v.] An upheaval; an uplift: in mining, the opposite of downtrow. Where a fault has occurred which has been attended by an up-and-down movement of the rock on each side, the displacement in the upward direction is called the upthrow, and that in the downward direction the downtrow. As a result of this motion, under great pressure, and royal personages, as an emblem of supreme power. It also occurs frequently on either side of a winched star disk, emblematic of the supremacy of the sun, of good over evil, or of Horus over Set. The actual basis of the symbol is supposed to be the Egyptian asp or cobra, Naja haje. See also ent under asp.

ural (ū'ral), n. A hypnotic remedy, formed by the combination of chloral hydrate with urethane.

Ural-Altaic (ū'ral-al-tā'ik), a. See Altaic.

Uralian (ū-rā'li-an), a. [< Ural (see def.) (Russ. Urali) + -ian.] Relating to the river Ural, or to the Ural Mountains, in Russia and Siberia.

Uralic (ū-rā'ik), a. [< Ural (see def.) + -ic.] Pertaining to the Ural Mountains or river Ural.

uralite (ū-rā-lit), n. [< Ural + -ite<sup>2</sup>.] The name given by G. Rose to a mineral which has the crystalline form of augite, but the physical properties and especially the cleavage and specific gravity of hornblende. Uralite is generally called a paramorph of hornblende, but this paramorphism is frequently accompanied by some chemical change, especially the elimination of more or less lime, which appears intermingled with the hornblende in the form of calcite or epidote. See uralitization. Uralite-syenite, a variety of syenite, from Turgojak in the Ural Mountains, in which the orthoclase exhibits a very peculiar form of cleavage. There are three cleavage-planes, instead of two as in the ordinary orthoclase, and in all of these lie minute scales of specular iron. Jeromeff.

uralitic (ū-rā-lit'ik), a. [< uralite + -ic.] In lithol., having the characters of uralite in a greater or less degree; containing, or consisting wholly or in part of, uralite. See uralitization.

uralitization (ū-rā-lit-i-zā'shōn), n. The paramorphic change of augite to hornblende. See uralite. This form of metamorphism is of very common occurrence, especially among the diabases, some varieties of which rock are, for this reason, called uralite-diabase; the same is true also of the porphyries and porphyrites, giving rise to the name uralite-porphyr and uralite-porphyrite.

uralitize (ū-rā-lit-i-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. uralitized, ppr. uralitizing. [< uralite + -ize.] In lithol., to convert into uralite.

uran (ū'ran), n. Same as uran.

A salt formed by the union of uranic acid with a metallic oxide.

uran-glimmer (ū-rān-glim'ēr), n. Same as uranite.

Urania (ū-rā'ni-ā), n. [NL. < L. Urania, < Gr. Οὐρανία, one of the Muses, lit. 'the Heavenly One,' fem. of οὐρανός, heavenly. < οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the sky: see Uranus.] 1. In Gr. myth., the Muse of astronomy and celestial forces, and the arbitress of fate, second only to Calliope in the company of the Muses. Her usual attributes are a globe, which she often holds in her hand, and a little staff or a compass for indicating the course of the stars. See Muse<sup>2</sup>. 2. A genus of large and handsome diurnal moths, typical of the family Uraniidæ, as U. fulgens. Fa-

Urania—From an antique in the Louvre

Butterfly Hawk-moth (Urania fulgens), two thirds natural size.

bricius, 1808. They have a short but stout body, anterior wings with a very oblique external margin, and dentate hind wings with long tails. They greatly resemble butterflies of the genus Papilio, and are sometimes called butterfly hawk-moths. They occur most commonly in tropical and subtropical America. A few species, however, have been found in Madagascar and on the east coast of Africa. The larva is cylindrical with long delicate setae, and the pupa is inclosed within a thin cocoon.

3. In ornith., a genus of humming-birds. Fitzinger, 1863.

Uranian (ū-rā'ni-an), a. [< Uranus + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the planet Uranus.

The most singular circumstance attending the whole Uranian system.

Ball, Story of the Heavens, p. 169. (Encyc. Diet.)

uranic<sup>1</sup> (ū-rā'ik), a. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, the sky (see Uranus), + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the heavens; celestial; astronomical.

On I know not what telluric or uranic principles.

Carlyle.

uraniferous (ū-rā-nif'e-rus), a. Containing or characterized by the presence of uranium.

Uraniidæ (ū-rā-nī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), < Urania + -idæ.] A family of moths, much resembling butterflies of the family Papilionidæ, belonging between the Sesidæ and Zygenidæ. In Westwood's system it included the forms now separated in the family Castniidæ. The species are all tropical. The principal genera are Urania and Nyctalemon.

uraninite (ū-rā-ni-tit), n. [< uranic + -in<sup>1</sup> + -ite<sup>2</sup>.] A mineral of a pitch-black color and very heavy, having when unaltered a specific gravity of 9.5. It usually occurs massive, rarely in regular octahedrons, and is commonly met with in granitic rocks. Its exact chemical composition is uncertain, but it consists essentially of the oxide of uranium ( $UO_2$ ), also thorium, lead, and other elements in small amount, with, further, from 1 to 2.5 per cent. of nitrogen. It is the chief source of uranium; and it is also the only mineral in the primitive crust of the earth in which the element nitrogen is known to exist. Also called pitch-blende.

uranion (ū-rā'ni-on), n. A musical instrument, invented in 1810 by Buschmann. It consisted of a graduated set of pieces of wood which could be sounded by pressure against a revolving wheel. It was played from a keyboard.

uranisci, n. Plural of uraniscus.

uraniscotitis (ū-rā-nis-kō-nī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth (see uraniscus), + -itis.] Inflammation of the uraniscus or palate.

uraniscoplasty (ū-rā-nis'kō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth, + πλασσειν, form, mold, shape.] Plastic surgery of the palate. Also uranoplasty.

uraniscorraphy (ū-rā-nis-kor'a-fi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth, + ραφή, a seam, a sewing, < ράπτειν, sew.] Suture of the palate.

uraniscus (ū-rā-nis'kus), n.; pl. uranisci (-sī). [NL., < Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth, lit. 'a little vault,' dim. of οὐρανός, the vault of heaven: see Uranus.] In anat., the roof, vault, or canopy of the mouth—that is, the palate. See cut under palate.

uranite (ū-rā-nit), n. [< uranium + -ite<sup>2</sup>.] An ore of uranium, of an emerald-green, grass-green, leek-green, or yellow color, transparent or subtranslucent. Mineralogically it includes two species—autunite, a phosphate of uranium and calcium (lime uranite), and torbernite, a phosphate of uranium and copper (copper uranite). Also called uran-glimmer and uran-mica.

uranitic (ū-rā-nit'ik), a. [< uranite + -ic.] Pertaining to or containing uranite.

uranium (ū-rā'ni-um), n. [NL.: so called in allusion to the planet Uranus, and in compliment to Sir W. Herschel, its discoverer; < Uranus, q. v.] Chemical symbol, U; atomic weight, 240. A metal discovered by Klaproth, in 1789, in a mineral which had been long known, and called pitch-blende, but which was supposed to be an ore of either zinc or iron. The metal itself was first isolated by Pélitot, that which Klaproth had supposed to be a metal proving, on further examination, to be an oxide. Metallic uranium as obtained by the reduction of the chlorid has a specific gravity of 18.7, and resembles nickel in color. Uranium is far from being a widely distributed element; its combinations are few in number, and most of them rare. Pitch-blende is the most abundant and important of them, consisting chiefly of uranoso-uranic oxide, with usually a considerable percentage of impurities of various kinds, especially sulphuret of lead, arsenic, etc. Uranium belongs to the chromium group of elementary bodies. Sodium diuranate, or uranium-yellow, is quite an important yellow pigment, which is used on glass and porcelain, and in making yellow glass. Uranium pigments are much rarer and more expensive than those of which chromium forms the essential part.

uran-mica (ū-rān-mī'kā), n. [< uranic + -mica.] Same as uranite.

uran-ocher (ū-rān-ō'kēr), n. [< uranic + -ocher.] A yellow earthy oxide of uranium. It occurs in soft friable masses, disseminated or incrusting, along with pitch-blende or uraninite, in the granites of Saxony and France.

uranographic (ū-rā-nō-graf'ik), a. [< uranograph-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to uranography. Also ouranographic.

uranographical (ū-rā-nō-graf'i-kal), a. [< uranographic + -al.] Same as uranographic. Also ouranographical.

uranographist (ū-rā-nō-grā-fist), n. [< uranograph-y + -ist.] One versed in uranography. Also ouranographist.

uranography (ū-rā-nō-grā-fi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] That branch of astronomy which consists in the description of the fixed stars, their positions, magnitudes, colors, etc.; uranology. Also ouranography.

uranolite (ū-rān'ō-lit), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + λίθος, stone.] A meteorite. At an early period in the history of the study of meteorites they were sometimes called uranolites, more generally acrolites; in later years the name meteorite has become generally adopted wherever English is spoken, and the same is true for most of the other European languages.

uranology (ū-rā-nō'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge of the heavens.

uranometry (ū-rā-nōm'e-tri), n.; pl. uranometries (-triz). [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] 1. The measurement of stellar distances.—2. A description of the principal fixed stars arranged in constellations, with their designations, positions, and magnitudes.

The uranometries of Bayer [1603], Flamsteed, Argander, Heis, and Gould give the lucid stars of one or both hemispheres laid down on maps.

Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 435.

uranoplasty (ū-rā-nō-plas-ti), n. Same as uraniscoplasty.

uranoscope (ū-rā-nō-skōp), n. [< NL. Uranoscopus.] A fish of the genus Uranoscopus; a star-gazer. See cut under star-gazer.

Uranoscopidæ (ū-rā-nō-skōp'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Richardson, 1848), < Uranoscopus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, whose type genus is Uranoscopus; the star-gazers. The family has been variously limited. By American ichthyologists it is restricted to those species, chiefly inhabiting warm temperate seas of both hemispheres, which have an oblong body, cuboid head with nearly vertical eyes and mouth, oblong anal fin, complete jugular ventral fins, and the lateral line running near the dorsal fin. See cut under star-gazer.

Uranoscopus (ū-rā-nō-skōp), n. [NL. (Gronovius; Linnæus, 1766), < L. uranoscopus, < Gr. οὐρανόσκοπος, a fish called otherwise καλιόωννμος (see Callionymus), lit. 'observing the heavens,' < οὐρανός, the heavens, + σκοπεῖν, observe, view.] The typical genus of Uranoscopidæ. U. scaber is a Mediterranean fish, known to the ancients.

uranoscopy (ū-rā-nō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανόσκοπία, < οὐρανόσκοπος, observing the heavens, < οὐρανός, the heavens, + σκοπεῖν, view.] Contemplation of the heavenly bodies.

uranostomatoscopy (ū-rā-nō-stōm'a-tō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the roof of the mouth, + στόμα (-r), the mouth, + σκοπεῖν, view.] Inspection of the roof of the mouth or palate: as, "phrenopathic uranostomatoscopy." Medical News, XLIX. 559. [Rare.]

uranothorite (ū-rā-nō-thō'rīt), n. A variety of the thorium silicate; thorite containing a small percentage of oxide of uranium.

uranous (ū-rā-nus), a. [< uranium + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the metal uranium: noting salts of which the base is uranium protoxide.

Uranus (ū-rā-nus), n. [< L. Uranus, < Gr. Οὐρανός, Uranus, a personification of οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the sky, heaven, the heavens, = Skt. Varuna, a deity of highest rank in the Veda, later a god of the waters, < var, cover, encompass.] 1. In classical myth., the son of Ge or Gaia (the Earth), and by her the father of the Titans, Cyclopes, etc. He hated his children, and confined them in Tartarus; but on the instigation of Gaia, Kronos, the youngest of the Titans, overthrew and dethroned him. Also written Ouranos.

2. In astron., the outermost but one of the planets, appearing to the naked eye as a faint star. It was discovered as a moving body with a disk, March 13th, 1781, by Sir W. Herschel, but had previously been observed twenty times as a star by different observers. These are called the ancient observations of Uranus. The planet, seen with a telescope of the first class, appears as a small bluish disk with two bands. The diameter perpendicular to these is less than that parallel to them by  $\frac{1}{4}$ . It is a little smaller than Neptune, its diameter being 31,000 miles; its mass is  $\frac{1}{8500}$  of the sun, or 14.7 times

2t. Trifling; foolish.

Our Bishop . . . made himself merry with the conceit how easy it was to stride over such urchin articles. No man would find leisure to read the whole 30, they are so frivolous. Bp. Hackett, Abp. Williams, ii. 91. (Davies.)

urchin-fish (ér'chin-fish), n. A prickly globe-fish or sea-porcupine, Diadon hystrix, or a similar species. See cut under Diadon.

urchin-form (ér'chin-fôrm), n. The form or type of form of a sea-urchin. Gegenbaur.

urchont, urchount, n. Obsolete forms of urchin.

urdé (ér-dä'), a. [AF. urde, ordé, pointed, < OHG. MHG. ort, a point, end, angle, edge, place, = AS. ME. ord, point of a sword, point: see ord.] In her.: (a) Having one or more extremities pointed bluntly, as by the lines bounding it making an angle of 90 degrees. (b) Having a single blunt-pointed projection from some part: as, a bend urdé, which has usually in the middle of the upper side a prominence ending in a blunt point. (c) Same as varriated. Also urly, mately.

Urdū (ör'dū), n. [Also Ordoo; = F. urdu, ourdou; < Hind. urdū, Hindustani, so named because it grew up since the eleventh century in the camps of the Mohammedan conquerors of India as a means of communication between them and the subject population of central Hindustan; prop. zabān-i-urdū, 'camp-language,' < urdū = Turk. ordū, ordū, a camp, < Pers. urdū, a court, camp, horde of Tatars, also ördū, whence ult. E. horde.] A native name for the present Hindustani tongue. See Hindustani. Also used adjectively.

urdy (ér'di), a. In her., same as urdé.

ure (ür), n. [ME. ure, < OF. eure, uevre, ovre, F. œuvre, work, action, operation, = Sp. Pg. obra = It. opera, < L. opera, work: see opera, operate, and cf. inure, manure, manœuvre.] Operation; use; practice.

And sure it is taken by custome and ure,
Whye yonge you be there is helpe and cure.

His Majesty could wish the ancient statutes were in ure of holding a parliament every year.

Bacon, Draft of King's Speech, 1614.

We will never from henceforth enact, put in ure, promulge, or execute any new canons, etc.

Act of Submission of Clergy to Henry VIII., in R. W. (Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., ii., note.)

ure (ür), r. t. and i. [ < ur, n. ] To work; practice; inure; exercise. More.

ure (ür), n. [ME. ure, < OF. eure, eür, aür, F. heur (in bon-heur, mal-heur), fate, luck, fortune, F. also augure = Pr. agur = Sp. agüero = Pg. It. augurio, < L. augurium, augury: see augury. Doublet of augury.] Fortune; destiny.

Myne hole affiance, and my lady free,
My goddesse bright, my fortune and my ure.

ure (ür), n. [ < L. urus, a kind of wild bull: see urus.] The urus.

The third kind is of them that are named ures. These are of bignes somewhat lesse than elephants, in kind and color and shape like a bull. Golding, Caesar, fol. 163.

ure (ür), pron. A Middle English form of our 1.

ure (ür), n. A Middle English form of hour.

ure (ür), n. [Ir. Gael. uir, mold, earth. Cf. urry.]

Soil: as, an ill ure (a bad soil). [Scotch.]

ure (ür), n. See ure 3.

-ure. [F. -ure = Sp. Pg. It. -ura, < L. -ura, a term. of fem. nouns denoting employment or result. It is usually attached to the pp. stem of verbs, and the noun has the same form as the fem. of the future participle: examples are apertura, an opening, armatura, equipment, junctura, a joining, scriptura, a writing, textura, web, etc. In some E. words the termination -ure represents L. -atura (> OF. -eüre, > E. -ure), as in armure, now armour, armor, ult. identical with armature.] A termination of Latin origin, appearing in the formation of many nouns, as in apertura, armature, juncture, scripture, texture, fissure, pressure, etc. It is sometimes used as an English formative, as in wasture.

urea (ür-ä), n. [NL. < Gr. ōpov, urine: see urine.] Carbamide, CO(NH<sub>2</sub>)<sub>2</sub>, a crystalline solid, soluble in water, and forming crystalline compounds with both acids and bases. It is the final product of the proteid decomposition in the body, and forms the chief solid constituent of the urine of mammals. It appears also in the urine of birds.

ureal (ür-ä), a. [ < urea + -al.] Of, relating to, or containing urea: as, a ureal solution.

ureameter (ür-ä-m'ë-tër), n. An apparatus for determining the amount of urea in the urine.

ureametry (ür-ä-m'ë-tri), n. The quantitative test for urea in the urine.

uredt, a. [ < ure 2 + -ed 2. ] Fortunate.

In my selfe I me assured
That in my body I was wel ured.

The Isle of Ladies, l. 144.

Uredineæ (ür-rē-din'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bron-gniart, 1824), < Uredo (-din-) + -æ.] An order of minute ascomycetous fungi, parasitic chiefly upon living flowering plants and ferns, and frequently very injurious to them. It includes the forms known as rust, smut, mildew, etc. The order is remarkable for the peculiar alternation of forms undergone by many of the species, which are known as the acidium form, uredoform, and teleutoform, and which were long considered as independent genera. Puccinia graminis, the so-called corn-mildew, may be taken as the type of the course of development followed by most Uredineæ, the three form-genera Acidium, Uredo, and Puccinia being different stages of it. The first or acidium stage is the cluster-cup of the barberry; the second or uredoform is the red-rust of grain; and the third or Puccinia is the mature form. See Fungi, Puccinia, rusti, s. mildew, Micro-puccinia, Contumyces, heterocism.—Tremelloid Uredineæ, a group of Uredineæ which do not possess a sporocarp generation, but consist of a teleutospore-bearing generation with usually softer and more gelatinous membranes.

uredineous (ür-rē-din'ē-us), a. [ < Uredineæ + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to the Uredineæ.—2. Affected by uredo.

Uredines (ür-rē-din'ē-s), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Uredo.] In bot., the Uredineæ.

uredinoid (ür-rē-din'oid), a. In bot., resembling the Uredineæ, or having their characters.

uredinous (ür-rē-din'us), a. Same as uredineous.

Uredo (ür-rē-dō), n. [NL. < L. uredo, a blight, a blast, < urere (√ us), kindle, burn: see ustion.] 1. A form-genus or stage in the development of fungi of the order Uredineæ. It is the stage next preceding the final or Puccinia stage, until recently considered a distinct genus, and many forms whose complete life-history is unknown are for convenience still retained under this name. Compare cuts under Puccinia and spermogonium.

2. [l. c.] A receptacle or hymenium in which uredospores are produced.

uredoform (ür-rē-dō-fôrm), n. In bot., the form assumed by a uredineous fungus in the uredo condition—that is, that stage in which the uredospores are produced.

uredo-fruit (ür-rē-dō-frût), n. In bot., same as uredospore.

uredo-gonidium (ür-rē-dō-gō-nid'i-um), n. In bot., same as uredospore.

uredospore (ür-rē-dō-spôr), n. In bot., in Uredineæ, the peculiar spore produced during the uredoform stage of the fungus. It is formed by acrogenous separation from a sterigma, and on germination produces a mycelium which bears uredospores or both uredospores and teleutospores. It is produced during the summer, and serves to reproduce and extend the fungus rapidly. See Puccinia, 1 (n) (with cut), heterocism, and spore 2.

uredosporic (ür-rē-dō-spor'ik), a. [ < uredospore + -ic.] In bot., of or pertaining to a uredospore.

ureide (ür-rē-id or -id), n. [ < urea + -ide 1. ] A compound of urea with an acid radical. The ureides include a large number of urea-derivatives of very complex structure.

uremia, uræmia (ür-rē-mi-ä), n. [NL. uræmia, < Gr. ōpov, urine, + aiua, blood.] A condition resulting from the retention in the blood of waste products, chiefly urea, that should normally be eliminated by the kidneys. Its symptoms are mainly those of a nervous character, such as headache, nausea, delirium, and convulsions or somnolence followed by coma.

uremic, uræmic (ür-rē-mik), a. [ < uremia + -ic.] Of or pertaining to uremia; causing uremia; affected with uremia: as, uremic convulsions.

Urena (ür-rē-nä), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1732), < uren, its name in Malabar.] A genus of plants, of the order Malvaceæ, type of the tribe Ureneæ. It is characterized by flowers with five connate bractlets, and fruit everywhere roughened by minute hooks. There are 4 or perhaps 6 species, known as Indian mallow, natives of tropical Asia or Africa, with one or two also widely dispersed through warm parts of America. They are herbs or shrubs, with usually angled or lobed leaves, and small yellowish flowers, commonly in sessile clusters. They are employed medicinally for their mucilaginous properties in India and elsewhere. In Brazil the flowers of U. lobata furnish an expectorant, and the roots and stems a decoction used for colic. U. lobata and U. sinuata, both common throughout the tropics, yield from their inner bark a useful fiber; that of the former, the guazima of Brazil, makes a strong cordage and a good paper. At Penang the scentless leaves of U. lobata—there an abundant weed, known as perpulut—are collected, dried, and sold for mixing with patchouli, which they resemble.

Urenæx (ür-rē-nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Urena + -æx.] A tribe of petaloid plants, of the order Malvaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with ten styles, by the stamencolumn being truncate or five-toothed at the top and externally anther-bearing below, and by five carpels, which separate at maturity. It includes 5 genera, mainly tropical herbs or shrubs. See Pavonia and Urena (the type).

ure-ox (ür'oks), n. [ < ure 3 + ox.] The urus. J. T. White, Diet.

Urera (ür-rē-rä), n. [NL. (Gaudichaud, 1826), so called with ref. to the stinging hairs usually present; irreg. < L. urere, burn: see ustion.] A genus of plants, type of the subtribe Ureæ, of the order Urticaceæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Urtica by its baccate fruiting calyx. The 22 species are natives of tropical America, Africa, and islands of the Indian and Pacific Oceans. They are shrubs or small trees. A few are climbers, as U. elata of Jamaica, which is said to reach a height of 30 feet. They constitute, together with species of Pilea, the plants known as nettle in the West Indies, replacing there the genus Urtica. U. glabra (U. Sandwicensis), the opuhe of the Hawaiians, a small tree free from stinging hairs, yields a valuable fiber highly esteemed there for making fishing-nets. Several other species furnish fiber for ropes, as U. baccifera, a small prickly tree frequent from Cuba to Brazil, used medicinally in the West Indies as an aperient. U. tenax, a recently described South African species, yields a fiber resembling ramie.

uretal (ür-rē-tal), a. Same as ureteric.

ureter (ür-rē-tër), n. [ < Gr. ōūprēp, the urethra, also one of the urinary ducts of the kidneys. < ōūpeiv, urinate, < ōpov, urine: see urine.] The excretory duct of the kidney; a tube conveying the renal excretion (urine) to the bladder, when that structure exists, as in mammals, or into the cloaca, in case no bladder exists—in any case, into the lower part of the allantoic cavity of the fetus, however modified in adult life. See cut under kidney. In man the ureter is a very slender tube, from 15 to 18 inches long, running from the pelvis of the kidney to the base of the bladder, at the posterior angle of the trigonum. It rests chiefly upon the psoas muscle, behind the peritoneum. Its structure includes a fibrous coat, longitudinal and circular muscular fibers, and a lining of mucous membrane, with vessels and nerves from various sources. The ureter pierces the wall of the bladder very obliquely, running for nearly an inch between the muscular and mucous coats of that viscus.

ureteric (ür-rē-tër'ik), a. [ < ureter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a ureter.

ureteritis (ür-rē-tër-rit'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ōūprēp, ureter, + -itis.] Inflammation of the ureter.

ureterolith (ür-rē-tër-ō-lith), n. A urinary concretion formed or lodged in the ureter.

urethane, urethan (ür-rē-thān, -than), n. [ < ur (ea) + eth (er) + -ane.] In chem., any ester of carbamic acid.—Ethyl urethane, CO.NH<sub>2</sub>.O.CH<sub>3</sub>, a white crystalline solid, somewhat used in medicine as a hypnotic.

urethra (ür-rē-thrā), n.; pl. urethræ (-thrē). [= F. urèthre = Sp. uretra = Pg. urethra = It. uretra, < L. urethra, < Gr. ōūprēp, the passage for urine, < ōūpeiv, urinate, < ōpov, urine: see urine.] A modification of a part of a urogenital sinus into a tube or a groove for the discharge of the secretion of the genital or urinary organs, or both; in most mammals, including man, a complete tube from the bladder to the exterior, conveying urine and semen in the male sex, urine only in the female; in some birds, a penial groove for the conveyance of semen only. The urethra of the male is always a part of the penis, or a penial urethra, continuous usually with the urethral part of the urogenital sinus; that of the female is only exceptionally a part of the clitoris. In man the urethra extends from the neck of the bladder to the end of the penis, usually a distance of 8 or 9 inches. It is divided into three sections. The prostatic is that first section of the urethra which is embraced by the prostatic gland, 12 inches long, somewhat fusiform; upon its floor is a longitudinal ridge, the veru montanum or caput gallinaginis, on each side of which is a depression, the prostatic sinus, perforated by openings of the prostatic ducts. In advance of the veru is a median depression or cul-de-sac, variously known as the vesicula prostatica, rugina masculina, sinus peculiaris, uterus masculinus, etc.; and the orifices of the ejaculatory ducts of the seminal vesicles open here. The membranous is that second section of the urethra, about 3 inch long, which extends from the prostatic gland to the corpus spongiosum; it is contracted in caliber, perforates the deep perineal fascia, and is embraced by layers reflected from this fascia and by the specialized compressor urethræ muscle. The spongy section of the urethra extends from the membranous section to the end of the penis, being all that part of the urethra which is embraced by the penial corpus spongiosum. It is dilated at its beginning—this dilatation being sometimes specified as the bulbous section of the urethra, and further marked by the opening of the ducts of Cowper's glands—and at its end, within the glans penis, this terminal enlargement being the fossa navicularis. The urethra ends in a narrow vertical slit, the meatus urinarius. Numerous submucous follicles, the glands of Littre, open into the spongy section of the urethra; one of these openings forms a recess of considerable size, the lacuna magna. The substance of the urethra includes mucous, muscular, and erectile tissue. In the female the urethra is very short, about 1½ inches in length, and much more simple in structure and relations than that of the male.—Bulb of the urethra. See bulb.—Bulbous urethra, that part of the extent of the urethra which corresponds to its bulb. See bulb.—Crista urethræ. See crista.—Membranous urethra, the membranous section of the urethra. See def.—Penial urethra, a urethral groove or tube which forms part of strictions for any of the slender-billed birds of the auk family, as U. troile, the common foolish murre or guillemot, and U. grylle, the black guillemot. Since the genus Lomvia was instituted for the former, Uria has usually been restricted to the latter, in which sense it is otherwise called Cephus or Cephus. See cuts under guillemot and murre.

Of, pertaining to, or obtained from urine.—Uric acid, an acid,  $C_5H_4O_3$ , characteristic of urine. It crystallizes in scales of various shapes of a brilliant white color and silky luster when pure, but in the urine the crystals are of a reddish-yellow color. It is inodorous and insipid, heavier than water, nearly insoluble in it when cold, and only to a slight extent dissolved by it when hot. The solution reddens litmus-paper, but feebly. When it is dissolved in nitric acid, and the solution is evaporated and treated with ammonia, a fine purple color is produced; by this reaction uric acid may be detected. It occurs in small quantity in the healthy urine of man and quadrupeds, but is the chief constituent in the urine of birds and reptiles; hence it is often found abundantly in Peruvian guano. It is normally present in small amount in the blood as urate, and it constitutes the principal proportion of some urinary calculi and of the concretions causing the complaint known as the gravel. Sometimes called lithic acid.

uricemia, uricæmia (û-ri-sê'mi-ä), n. [NL. uricæmia, irreg. < uricus, uric, + Gr. aima, blood.] Same as lithæmia.

Uriconian (û-ri-kô'ni-an), n. [< Uriconium (see def.) + -ian.] The name given by some English geologists to a series of volcanic rocks, of which the Wrekin, in Shropshire, England, is chiefly made up, and which is supposed to occupy a position very near the bottom of the fossiliferous series. The name is from the Roman station Uriconium, the site of the present village of Wroxeter, in Shropshire.

uridrosis (û-ri-drô'sis), n. The excretion of certain urinary constituents, notably urea, in the sweat.

Urinæ (û-ri-i'nê), n. pl. [NL. < Uria + -inæ.] A subfamily of Alcidae, named from the genus Uria; the murre and guillemots. Also Urinæ.

urile (û'ril), n. A kind of cormorant, Phalacrocorax urile of Gmelin, or P. bicristatus of Pallas.

The fowl urile, of which there is great plenty in Kamtschatka. Krascheninikoff, Kamtschatka (trans.), p. 157.

urim (û'rim), n. pl. [< Heb. urim, pl. of ûr, light, < ûr, shine.] Certain objects mentioned in the Old Testament, with the thummim (Ex. xxviii. 30, etc.) or alone (Num. xxvii. 21; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6), as connected with the ritual; or breastplate of the Jewish high priest, and with oracular responses given by him. The true nature of the urim and thummim (literally 'lights and perfections') is not known. They seem to have been small objects kept inside the so-called "breastplate," which was folded double, and many authorities believe them to have been precious stones or figures, used as lots or otherwise. There is no indication of their use after the time of David, and after the captivity they are alluded to as lost.

urinæmia, n. See urinemia.

urinal (û-ri-nal), n. [< ME. urinal, urynal, orynal, < OF. urinal, orinal, F. urinal = Pr. urinal = Sp. orinal = Pg. orinol = It. orinale, < ML. urinal, a urinal, orig. neut. of L. urinalis, of or pertaining to urine, < urina, urine: see urine.]

1. A vessel for containing urine, or a bottle in which it is kept for inspection.

These follies are within you and shine through you like the water in an urinal. Shak., T. G. of V., li. 1. 41.

2. A convenience, public or private, for the accommodation of persons requiring to pass urine.

urinalist (û-ri-nal-ist), n. [< urinal + -ist.] One who by inspection of a patient's urine professed to determine the disease.

My urinalist . . . left no artery unstretched upon the tenters. Bekker, Match me in London, iii.

urinant (û-ri-nant), a. [< L. urinan(t)s, ppr. of urinari, dive, plunge under water, < urina, in the orig. sense 'water': see urine.] In her., being in the attitude of diving or plunging; noting a dolphin or fish when represented with the head down.

urinary (û-ri-nā-ri), a. and n. [= F. urinaire = Sp. Pg. urinario = It. orinario, < ML. **urinarius* (in neut. urinarium, a urinal), < L. urina, urine: see urine.] I. a. Of or pertaining to urine or the organs connected with the secretion and discharge of urine. Urinary canal, a primitive urinary passage.—Urinary cast. Same as renal cast (which see, under cast).—Urinary organs, the kidneys, bladder, ureters, and urethra of any higher vertebrate, as a reptile, bird, or mammal; the Wolffian bodies and ducts of any embryo vertebrate and of the adult of any of the lower vertebrates, as a fish; the organs, of whatever nature, concerned in the secretion and excretion of urine, or of any substance the removal of which from the system corresponds physiologically to the elimination of urea. Such are the organ of Bojanus of a mollusk, the segmental organs of worms, and the water-vascular system of a turbellarian. See urogenital and uropoietic.

II. n.; pl. urinary (-riz). 1. In agri., a reservoir or place for the reception of urine, etc., for manure.—2. Same as urinal, 2.

urinate (ū'ri-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. urinated, pp. urinating. [L. urinatus, pp. of urinare; urinate: see urine, v.] To discharge urine; micturate; make water.

urination (ū'ri-nā'shōn), n. [L. urinate + -ion.] The act of passing urine; micturition.—Precipitant urination, urination where the desire to pass urine is very sudden and imperative.

Medicines urinate do not work by rejection and indigestion, as solutive do. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 43.

urinator (ū'ri-nā-tōr), n. [L. urinator, a diver, < urinar, dive, plunge under water: see urine, v.] 1. A diver; one who plunges and sinks in water, as in search of pearls. [Rare.]

Those relations of urinator belong only to those places where they have dived, which are only rocky. Ray.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Cuvier, 1800; Lacépède, 1801).] A genus of diving birds, giving name to the Urinatoridae: variously applied. Quite recently the name was revived, and definitely restricted to the loons, whose usual generic name, Colymbus, was thereupon transferred to certain grebes. See Colymbus, and cuts under loon and tibias.

urinatorial (ū'ri-nā-tō'ri-al), a. [See urinator.] Of or pertaining to the Urinatoridae: being or resembling one of the Urinatoridae.

Urinatoridae (ū'ri-nā-tō'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Urinator + -idae.] A family of diving birds; the loons: same as Colymbidae (b). When the loons are called Urinatoridae, the grebes become Colymbidae.

urine (ū'rin), n. [ME. urine, < OF. urine, urine, F. urine = Pr. urina = Sp. orina = Pg. aurina = It. orina, urina = D. urine = G. Sw. Dan. urin, < L. urina, urine, in form as if fem. of **urinus*, of water, < **urum*, water, urine, = Gr. οὖρον, urine, orig. water, = Skt. vārī, vār, water, = Zend vāra, rain, = Icel. ur = Sw. ur in ur-väder, drizzle, drizzling rain, = AS. wer, the sea.] An excrementitious fluid excreted by the kidneys, holding in solution most of the nitrogenous and other soluble products of tissue-change. Normal urine is of a clear amber or citron-yellow color, a brackish taste, a peculiar odor, a faintly acid reaction, and a specific gravity ranging from 1.015 to 1.025. Within the limits of health, however, it varies greatly in color, reaction, and density, according to the age, occupation, and diet of the individual, the time of day, and the season of the year. That passed in the morning upon rising is usually chosen for analysis, as presenting the average characteristics of the entire quantity excreted during the twenty-four hours. The average amount passed during this period is estimated at between three and four pints. The proportion of solid matters contained in every hundred parts of urine varies from three to seven parts or more, from 45 to 55 per cent. of which is urea, the rest being chlorid of sodium, phosphates, sulphates, ammonia, extractive matters, and uric acid. The chemical analysis of the urine and the microscopical examination of its sediment are important aids in the diagnosis and prognosis of many diseases. After its excretion in the cortical part of the kidney the urine passes at once through the ureters to the bladder, where it is held for a period and voided through the urethra at the will of the individual.

The Kyng of the Contree hathe alle wey an Ox with him; and he that kepeth him hathe every day grete fees, and kepeth every day his Dong and his Uryne in 2 Vesselles of Gold. Mandeville, Travels, p. 170.

Retention of urine. See retention.—Smoky urine. See smoky.—Urine indican. Same as uroanthin.

urine (ū'rin), v. i. [L. uriner = Sp. orinar = Pg. orinar = It. orinare, < ML. urinare, make water, urine (in L. urinari, plunge under water, dive), < L. urina, urine (orig. water): see urine, n.] To discharge urine; urinate.

No oviparous animals which spawn or lay eggs do urine, except the tortoise. Sir T. Browne.

urinemia, urinaemia (ū'ri-nē'mi-ā), n. [NL. urinemia, < Gr. οὖρον, urine, + αἷμα, blood.] The contamination of the blood with urinary constituents.

uriferous (ū'ri-nif'e-rus), a. [L. urina, urine, + ferre = E. bear.] Conveying urine: as, uriferous tubes or ducts.

urinific (ū'ri-nif'ik), a. [L. urina, urine, + ficus, < facere, make.] Secreting urine: uriparous; uropoietic; urogenous.

ducing or preparing urine: specifically applied to certain tubes with this function in the cortical part of the kidney.

urinogenital (ū'ri-nō-jen'i-tal), a. [L. urina, urine, + genitalis, genital.] Same as urogenital.

urinogenitary (ū'ri-nō-jen'i-tā-ri), a. [As urinogenital + -ary.] Same as urogenital.

These plexuses are distributed on the enteric tube, and on all the organs derived from it, as also on the vascular system and urino-genital organs.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 523.

urinology (ū'ri-nol'o-jī), n. [Gr. οὖρον, urine, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific study of the constitution of the urine, with special reference to the diagnostic significance of changes in its composition and appearance.

urinometer (ū'ri-nom'e-tēr), n. [L. urina, urine, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of urine. It is constructed upon the principle of the common hydrometer.

urinometric (ū'ri-nō-met'rik), a. [As urinometry + -ic.] Determining the specific gravity of urine by means of the urinometer; of or pertaining to urinometry.

urinometry (ū'ri-nom'e-trī), n. [L. urina, urine, + Gr. μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] The determination of the specific gravity of urine; the scientific use of the urinometer.

urinoscopic (ū'ri-nō-skop'ik), a. [L. urinoscopy + -ic.] Pertaining to the inspection of urine in the diagnosis and treatment of disease. Also uroscopy.

urinology (ū'ri-nō-skō-pi), n. [Gr. οὖρον, urine, + -σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, view.] Inspection or examination of urine in the diagnosis and treatment of disease. Also uroscopy.

urinose (ū'ri-nōs), a. [*NL. *urinosis*, urinous: see urinous.] Same as urinous. Ray, Works of Creation, ii.

urinous (ū'ri-nus), a. [F. urineux, < *NL. *urinosis*, < L. urina, urine: see urine.] Pertaining to urine, or partaking of its properties.

urion (ū'ri-on), n. [Mex.] One of sundry burrowing quadrupeds, as the marmot-squirrel of Mexico, Spermophilus mexicanus.

urite (ū'rit), n. [Gr. οὐρά, tail, + -ite.] The sternite, or sternal sclerite, of any abdominal or postabdominal segment of an insect; the ventral section of any uromere; originally, the whole of any primary abdominal segment; a uromere. Lacaze-Duthiers.

urjoon (ēr'jōn), n. An Indian plant, Terminalia Arjuna. See Terminalia.

urlar (ēr'lār), n. See piroch.

urle (ēr'l), n. In her., same as urle. [Rare.]

urman (ēr'man), n. In parts of Siberia, an extensive tract of coniferous forest, especially a swampy forest: a Tatar word closely allied in meaning to the word cedar-swamp as used in parts of the (United States) Upper Lake region.

Impenetrable forests and quivering marshes—the dreadful urmans, which are penetrated by man only for some 20 to 50 miles around the widely separated settlements. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 429.

urn (ēr'n), n. [ME. urne, < OF. (and F.) urne = Sp. Pg. It. urna, < L. urna, a jar, vase, proper a vessel of burnt clay or pottery, < urere, burn: see ustion.] 1. A kind of vase, usually rather large, having an oviform or rounded body with a foot; by extension (since the ashes of the dead were formerly put into such vessels), any receptacle for the dead body or its remains.

A vessel that men clepe th an urne. Of gold. Chaucer, Troilus, v. 311.

Two urns by Jove's high throne have ever stood, The source of evil one, and one of good. Pope, Iliad, xxiv. 663.

Storied urn and animated bust. Gray, Elegy.

2. A place of burial; a grave. [Rare.]

The most noble corse that ever herald Did follow to his urn. Shak., Cor., v. 6. 146.

3. A Roman measure for liquids, containing one half the amphora.—4. A tea-urn.—5. In bot., the hollow vessel in which the spores of mosses are produced; the sporogonium or spore-case; the theca. See cut under moss.—6. In the Dicymida, specifically, a cup-like part of the infusoriform embryo of a rhombogenous dicymid, consisting of a capsule, a lid, and contents. See Dicymida, and cut under Dicymida.—Cinerary urn. See cinerary.

urn (ēr'n), v. t. [L. urna, n.] To inclose in an urn, or as in an urn; inurn.

When horror universal shall descend, And heaven's dark concave urn all human race. Young.

urnal (ēr'nal), a. [L. urnalis, of or pertaining to an urn, < urna, an urn: see urn.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling an urn.

Urnal interments and burnt relics lie not in fear of worms. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, lii.

urn-flower (ēr'n'flou'ēr), n. See Urecolina.

urnful (ēr'n'fūl), a. [L. urna + -ful.] As much as an urn will hold; enough to fill an urn.

urn-shaped (ēr'n'shāpt), a. Having the shape of an urn.

Uroaëtus (ū-rō-ā'e-tus), n. [NL. (Kaup, 1844, and Uraëtus, 1845), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + αἰτός, an eagle.] A genus of Australian and Tasmanian eagles, with one species, U. audax, the so-called bald vulture of Latham (1801) and the mountain-eagle of Collins (1804). This eagle is 38 inches long, with the wing 24 inches. When adult it is of a general black color, varied on the nape with chestnut and on the wings and tail with whitish. The bill is 3 inches long, of a horn-color blackening at the tip, the cere and lores are yellowish, the feet are light-yellow, and the irides are hazel.

urobilin (ū-rō-bil'in), n. [Gr. οὖρον, urine, + L. bilis, bile, + -in.] A coloring matter found usually in small quantities in normal urine, but often present in large amount in this fluid in cases of fever. It is derived from the bile-pigments.

urobilinuria (ū-rō-bil-i-nū'ri-ā), n. [L. urobilin + Gr. οὖρον, urine.] A condition in which a large percentage of urobilin, formed from the bile-pigments, is present in the urine.

urocardiac (ū-rō-kār'di-ak), a. [Gr. οὐρά, tail, + καρδιά, the heart: see cardiac.] Noting certain calcifications of the posterior or prepyloric part of the cardiac division of the stomach of some crustaceans, as the crawfish: correlated with uropyloric. See cut under Astacidae. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 319.—Urocardiac process, a strong calcified process which extends backward and downward from the cardiac plate of the stomach of the crawfish, and which articulates with the prepyloric ossicle.

—Urocardiac tooth, a strong blind process which extends downward from the lower end of the prepyloric ossicle of the crawfish's stomach.

Urocerata (ū-rō-ser'a-tā), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κέρας, horn.] A division of securiferous terebrant Hymenoptera, contrasted with Tenthredinidae, and corresponding to the modern family Uroceridae (or Siricidae). See Uroceridae.

Uroceridae (ū-rō-ser'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Urocerus + -idae.] A family of phytophagous hymenopterous insects; the horn-tails, auger-flies, or Siricidae, named from the genus Urocerus. They are distinguished from the saw-flies (Tenthredinidae), which they most nearly resemble, by the fact that the female abdomen is furnished at the tip with a borer, and not with a pair of saws. The males may be distinguished by the single apical fore-tibial spur (the Tenthredinidae having two-spurred front tibiae). The family is not rich in genera and species, but is of wide distribution, and contains many striking forms. Four genera and 12 species occur in Europe, and the same number of genera and 40 species in North America. The pigeon-tremex, Tremex columba, is an example. Also Urocerata, Uroceratæ, and Urocerides. The family is called Siricidae in Europe, Uroceridae being held by American hymenopterists.

Urocerus (ū-rōs'e-rus), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1764), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of horn-tails, typical of the family Uroceridae, and distinguished by the exerted ovipositor, short neck, and fore wings with two marginal and three submarginal cells. They are some-

Urocyon (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1857).] A genus of the family Canidae, of which the common species is the Urocyon virginianus, the gray fox of the United States. The name is derived from uros, tail, + kyon, dog, = E. canid. See cut in preceding column.

Urocyon (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1857).] A genus of the family Canidae, of which the common species is the Urocyon virginianus, the gray fox of the United States. The name is derived from uros, tail, + kyon, dog, = E. canid. See cut in preceding column.

urochordal (ŭ-rō-khord'el), a. [uros, tail, + chord, = E. chorda.] Of or pertaining to the urochord; urochordate; of or pertaining to the urochordate.

urochordate (ŭ-rō-khord'at), a. [uros, tail, + chord, = E. chorda.] Of or pertaining to the urochordate.

Urochorda (ŭ-rō-khord'a), n. [NL. (Goebel, 1856).] A genus of the family Urochordata, of which the common species is the Urochorda, a small, worm-like, marine animal. The name is derived from uros, tail, + chorda, = E. chorda. See cut in preceding column.

urochrome (ŭ-rō-khrom), n. [uros, tail, + chrom, = E. chroma.] A yellow pigment of the urochrome.

urochrysis (ŭ-rō-khri-sis), n. [uros, tail, + chrysis, = E. chrysis.] A yellow pigment of the urochrysis.

Urochyla (ŭ-rō-khila), n. [NL. (Sharpe, 1881).] A genus of the family Urochylidae, of which the common species is the Urochyla, a small, worm-like, marine animal. The name is derived from uros, tail, + chyla, = E. chyla. See cut in preceding column.

Urochyla (ŭ-rō-khila), n. [NL. (Sharpe, 1881).] A genus of the family Urochylidae, of which the common species is the Urochyla, a small, worm-like, marine animal. The name is derived from uros, tail, + chyla, = E. chyla. See cut in preceding column.

Urocyon (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1857).] A genus of the family Canidae, of which the common species is the Urocyon virginianus, the gray fox of the United States. The name is derived from uros, tail, + kyon, dog, = E. canid. See cut in preceding column.

Urocyon (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1857).] A genus of the family Canidae, of which the common species is the Urocyon virginianus, the gray fox of the United States. The name is derived from uros, tail, + kyon, dog, = E. canid. See cut in preceding column.

Gray Fox, Urocyon virginianus.

Urocyon (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1857).] A genus of the family Canidae, of which the common species is the Urocyon virginianus, the gray fox of the United States. The name is derived from uros, tail, + kyon, dog, = E. canid. See cut in preceding column.

urocyst (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), n. [uros, tail, + cyst, = E. cystis.] The permanently pervious part of the cavity of the allantois of a mammal, for the reception and detention of urine; the urinary bladder; the cystic vesicle.

urocystic (ŭ-rō-sis'tik), a. [urocyst, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the urinary bladder; cystic; vesical.

urocystis (ŭ-rō-sis'tis), n.; pl. urocystes (-tēs). [NL.; see urocyst.] 1. Same as urocyst.—2. [cap.] A genus of ustilaginous fungi, containing several very destructive species, as U. cepulae, the smut of onions, U. pompholygodes on Ranunculaceae, etc. See onion-smut.

Urodela (ŭ-rō-dē'li), n. pl. [NL. (orig. F. pl. urodèles, Duméril), neut. pl. of **urodelus*: see urodele.] An order of Amphibia: the tailed amphibians; the ichthyomorphic amphibians, which retain the tail throughout life, as distinguished from the Anura, or tailless batrachians. They have a naked skin, and may or may not retain gills as well as tail, being thus either perennibranchiate or caducibranchiate. The salamanders, siens, efts, newts, tritons, etc., are urodeles. Equivalent names are Caudata, Ichthyoneura, Sauratrachia. See cuts under axolotl, hell-bender, Menobranchius, neot, Proteus, salamander, Salamandrina, and Spelerpes.

urodelan (ŭ-rō-dē'li-an), a. and n. [urodele, + -an.] Same as urodele.

urodele (ŭ-rō-dē'li), a. and n. [uros, tail, + delos, manifest.] 1. a. Tailed, as an amphibian; not anurous, as a batrachian; retaining the tail throughout life, as a salamander, newt, or eft; belonging to the Urodela.

II. n. Any member of the Urodela.

urodelian (ŭ-rō-dē'li-an), a. [urodele, + -ian.] Same as urodele.

urodelous (ŭ-rō-dē'li-us), a. [urodele, + -ous.] Same as urodele.

urodialysis (ŭ-rō-dē'li-i-sis), n. A partial suppression of urine.

uroerythrin (ŭ-rō-er'i-thrin), n. [uros, tail, + erythrin, = E. erythrin.] A red coloring matter, seldom if ever found in normal urine, but present in this fluid in fevers, especially rheumatic fever.

Urogalba (ŭ-rō-gal'bä), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1841).] A genus of the family Galbulidae, of which the common species is the Urogalba, a small, worm-like, marine animal. The name is derived from uros, tail, + galba, = E. galba. See cut in preceding column.

Paradise Jacamar, Urogalba paradisa.

Urogallus (ŭ-rō-gal'us), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777).] A genus of grouse: a synonym of Tetrao, and now the specific name of the capercaillie, Tetrao urogallus. See cut under capercaillie.

urogaster (ŭ-rō-gas'ter), n. [uros, tail, + gaster, = E. gaster.] The urinary intestine, or urinary passages collectively, which are developed from the original cavity of the allantois in connection with the primitive intestinal tract. It is that part of the allantoic cavity which continues pervious, with the passages connected with it (if there are any) subsequently developed. Compare perigaster.

urogastric (ŭ-rō-gas'trik), a. [urogaster, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the urogaster.—2. Of or pertaining to the posterior pair of divisions of the gastric lobe of the dorsal surface of the carapace of a crab. Huxley.

urogenital (ŭ-rō-jen'i-tal), a. and n. [uros, tail, + genitalis, = E. genitalis.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the urinary and genital organs; urinogenital. Also urinogenital, urinogenitary, genito-urinary. Urogenital canal, the urethra.—Urogenital sinus. See sinus.

II. n. A urogenital organ.

urogenous (ŭ-rō-jen'us), a. [uros, tail, + genus, = E. genus.] Producing: see -gen. Secreting or producing urine; uropoietic; uriniparous.

uroglaucin (ŭ-rō-glä'sin), n. [uros, tail, + glaukos, bluish-green.] A blue coloring matter occasionally found in alkaline urine in cases of inflammation of the bladder.

urohyal (ŭ-rō-hi'al), a. and n. [uros, tail, + hyal, = E. hyal.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the urohyal.

II. n. In ornith., the tail-piece of the composite hyoid bone; the median azygous backward-projecting element of that bone, borne upon the basi-hyal; the basibranchial element, or base of the first branchial arch.

Urolestes (ŭ-rō-les'tēs), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1850).] A monotypic genus of African shrikes, Lestes.

Urolestes melanoleucus.

of the family Laniidae, related to the fiscal shrikes. All the feathers of the head and neck are lanceolate, and the tail is long and much graduated, with the median rectrices long-exserted and more than twice as long as the wing. U. melanoleucus of southern and eastern Africa is glossy black and white, and 19 inches long, of which the tail is 13 inches; the wing is only 54. The resemblance of this snake to a magpie is striking.

urolithiasis (ū-rō-lī-thī-ā-sis), n. Same as lithiasis (a).

urological (ū-rō-loj'i-kal), a. [< urology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to urology.

urologist (ū-rō-lō-jist), n. [< urology + -ist.] One who is versed in urology. Lancet, No. 3433, p. 1216.

urology (ū-rō-lō-jī), n. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] Same as urinology.

uromancy (ū-rō-man-si), n. Diagnosis and prognosis of disease by inspection of the urine.

Uromastix (ū-rō-mas'tiks), n. [NL. (Merrem), < Gr. οὐρα, tail, + μάστιξ, whip, scourge.] A genus of agamoid lizards; the thorn-tailed agamas, having the tail ringed with spinose scales. Several species inhabit Europe, Asia, and Africa. Also Mastigurus.

uromelanin (ū-rō-mel'a-nin), n. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + μέλας (μελαν-), black.] A black pigment occasionally found in the urine as a result of the decomposition of urochrome.

uromelus (ū-rom'e-lus), n.; pl. uromeli (-li). [NL., < Gr. οὐρα, tail, + μέλος, a limb.] In teratol., a monster having the lower limbs united and terminating in a single foot; sympos.

uromere (ū-rō-mēr), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + μέρος, part.] A caudal or posterior segment of the body; a urosomite; any abdominal segment of an arthropod. See urosoma. A. S. Packard.

uromeric (ū-rō-mer'ik), a. [< uromere + -ic.] Of the nature of or pertaining to a uromere.

urometer (ū-rom'e-tēr), n. Same as urinometer.

Uromyces (ū-rom'i-sēs), n. [NL. (Link, 1816), < Gr. οὐρά, a tail, + μύκης, a mushroom.] A genus of uredineous fungi, having the teleutospores separate, unicellular, pedunculate, and produced in flat sori. About 180 species have been described.

Uropeltidae (ū-rō-pel'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Uropeltis + -idae.] A family of cylinder-snakes or tortricoid ophiidians, typified by the genus Uropeltis, having no rudiments of hind limbs, and the tail of variable character according to the genus; the rough-tails. The family is also called Rhinophidae. There are 7 genera.

Uropeltis (ū-rō-pel'tis), n. [NL. (Cuvier), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + πέλις, a shield.] A genus of serpents, giving name to the family Uropeltidae.

urophaein (ū-rō-fā'ē-in), n. A pigment-body contained in the urine, to the presence of which the characteristic odor of this fluid has been attributed.

urophtthisis (ū-rō-thī'sis), n. Diabetes mellitus. [Rare.]

uropplania (ū-rō-plā'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρον, urine, + πλανῶν, wander: see planet.] The occurrence or presence of urine anywhere in the body where it does not belong. Compare uremia, uridrosis.

uroplatoid (ū-rō-plā'toid), a. [< NL. Uroplates + -oid.] Of or pertaining to the Uroplatidae.

Uroplatidae (ū-rō-plā-toi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Uroplates (the type genus) + -idae.] A superfamily of eriglossate lacertilians, represented by a family Uroplatidae alone, having biconcave vertebrae, clavicles not dilated proximally, and no postorbital or postfrontal squamosal arches. T. Gill, Smithsonian Report, 1885.

uropod (ū-rō-pod), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ποῦς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] Any abdominal limb of an arthropod; an appendage of the urosome. A. S. Packard.

Uropoda (ū-rop'ō-dā), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1806): see uropod.] A genus of parasitic mites, of the family Gamasidae, having an excremental cord of varying length which attaches each individual to its host. They are parasitic upon various beetles. U. americana is commonly found clustering upon the Colorado potato-beetle, Doryphora decemlineata.

uropodal (ū-rop'ō-dal), a. [< uropod + -al.] Of the character of a uropod; pertaining to uropods; as, uropodal appendages.

uropoësis, uropoësis (ū-rō-pō-ē'sis, -poi-ē'sis), n. 1. The formation of urine; the excretion of urine or of its constituents from the blood, and its elimination from the body: noting the function of the uropoietic organs and its result. —2. The act of voiding urine; micturition; urination.

uropoietic (ū-rō-poi-ē'tik), a. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + ποιητικός, doing, < ποίω, make, do. Cf. chylipoietic.] In anat. and physiol., secreting or excreting urine; urinific; uniparous; urogenous: noting urinary or uniparous organs or their function; as, the uropoietic system; the uropoietic viscera. The epithet is applicable not only to the kidneys, but to associated structures, as the renal portal venous system, and also to the representative urinary organs, often very different, of those animals which have no true kidneys, as the Wolffian bodies of the lower invertebrates, and the water-vascular system of various invertebrates.

uropile (ū-rop'sil), n. [< Uropsilus.] A shrew-like animal of the genus Uropsilus.

Uropsilus (ū-rop'si-lus), n. [NL. (A. Milne-Edwards, 1872), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ψιλος, bare, smooth.] A genus of terrestrial shrew-moles, of the family Talpidae and subfamily Myogalinae. The fore feet are neither fossorial nor natatorial; there are 2 incisors, 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 3 molars in each upper half-jaw, and 1 incisor, 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 3 molars in each lower half-jaw. The type, U. sordipes of Tibet, combines the external form of a shrew with cranial characters of a mole.

Uropygi (ū-rō-pi'jī), n. pl. A suborder of pedipalp arachnidians, characterized by a long tail-like postabdomen, and including the true whip-scorpions, as the Thelyphonidae: contrasted with Amblypygi. See cut under Pedipalpi, and compare that under Phrynidia.

uropygial (ū-rō-pij'i-al), a. [< uropygium + -al.] In ornith., of or pertaining to the uropygial or rump: as, uropygial feathers.—Uropygial gland. See gland, and cut under elæodocho.

uropygium (ū-rō-pij'i-um), n.; pl. uropygia (-i-). [NL., < Gr. οὐροπύγιον, another reading of οὐροπύγιον, the rump of birds, < ορος, rump (οὐρά, tail), + πύγῃ, rump, buttocks.] In ornith., the rump; the terminal section of the body, represented by the caudal vertebrae, into which the tail-feathers are inserted; also, the upper surface of this part, or terminal section of the notæum, with limits not defined. See cuts under bird and elæodocho.

uropyloric (ū-rō-pi-lor'ik), a. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. pylorus, see pyloric.] Of or pertaining to the posterior part of the pyloric division of the stomach of certain crustaceans, as the crawfish: as, a uropyloric ossicle: correlated with urocardiac. Huxley.

urorrhagia (ū-rō-rā'ji-ā), n. Excessive micturition; diabetes.

urorrhæa, urorrhæa (ū-rō-rā'ā), n. Involuntary passage of urine; enuresis.

urosacral (ū-rō-sā'krāl), a. and n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. sacrum: see sacral.] 1. A. Situated between the sacrum and the coccyx; of or pertaining both to the sacrum and to the coccyx: as, the urosacral region. The term is specifically applied to the numerous equivocal vertebrae of the sacrum of a bird, which are situated between the sacral vertebrae proper and the free caudal or coccygeal vertebrae, and are ankylosed with one another, with the last true sacral vertebra, and to a greater or less extent with the ilia or ischia, or both.

II. n. In ornith., any vertebra of the urosacral region; any vertebra between the last true sacral and the first free caudal. See cuts under sacrum and sacrum.

urosacrum (ū-rō-sā'krum), n.; pl. urosacra (-krā). [NL., < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. sacrum, q. v.] That posterior part of a bird's compound sacrum which is formed of urosacral or false coccygeal bones ankylosed together and with the sacrum proper. See cuts under sacrum and sacrum.

Urosalpinx (ū-rō-sal'pingks), n. [NL. (W. Stimpson, 1865), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σάλπιγξ, a trumpet.] A genus of gastropods, of the family Muricidae, having a fusiform shell with radiating undulations or folds. U. cinerea, known as the drill or borer, is very destructive to oysters, whose shell it perforates, making a small round hole by means of its tongue. See drill, 5.

uroscopic (ū-rō-skop'ik), a. [< uroscop- + -ic.] Same as urinoscopic.

uroscopist (ū-rō-skō-pist), n. One who makes a specialty of urinary examinations; one who practises uromancy.

Acturius, the Uroscopist of the Byzantine court, described in the minutest detail the visible changes of urine in health and in disease.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VII. 403.

uroscopy (ū-rō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, view.] Same as urinology.

urosis (ū-rō'sis), n. A disease of the urinary organs.

urosomatic (ū-rō-sō-mat'ik), a. [< urosome (-soma-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the urosome; consisting of urosomites, as the segments of a lobster's tail.

urosoma (ū-rō-sōm), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σῶμα, body.] In biol.: (a) The last morphological segment of the tail; the terminal somatome of a vertebrate. See gephyrocercal. (b) The post-thoracic region of the body of arthropods; the abdomen or postabdomen as distinguished from the cephalothorax, and as composed of a series of urosomites or uromeres.

urosomite (ū-rō-sō'mit), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + E. somite.] One of the somites, segments, or rings of the urosome; a uromere.

urosomitic (ū-rō-sō-mit'ik), a. [< urosomite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a urosomite; uromeric.

Urospermum (ū-rō-spēr'mum), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), so called from the appendaged achenes; < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σπέρμα, seed.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Cichoriaceae and subtribe Scorzonereae. It is distinguished from the related genus Scorzonera by an involucre of a single row of bracts and by achenes with a dilated and hollow beak. The two species are natives of the Mediterranean region; one, U. picroides, also occurs, perhaps introduced, in South Africa. They are annuals or biennials, hairy or bristly, with radical or alternate deeply cut leaves, and yellow flowers sometimes with a spiny involucre. The flower-heads become greatly enlarged in fruit, terminating long swollen hollow branches; the achenes are long and often incurved, with a long hollow appendage or stalk below in addition to the elongated beak, which bears a soft plumose pappus. See sheep-bward.

urostealith (ū-rō-stē'a-lith), n. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + στέαρ, fat, tallow, + λίθος, stone.] A fatty matter occasionally found in urinary concretions, but very rarely composing the entire calculus. It is saponifiable in caustic potash, and soluble in alcohol and ether. It burns with a yellow flame, evolving an odor of shellac and benzoic, and when unmixed with other matters leaves no residue.

urostegal (ū-rō-stē-gal), a. and n. [< urostege + -al.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the urosteges; being one of the urosteges.

II. n. A urostegite or urostegite.

urostege (ū-rō-stēj), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + στέγη, a roof.] In herpet., one of the large special scales or scutes, generally alternating or two-rowed, which cover the under side of the tail of a snake, as the gastrosteges cover the abdomen. The number and disposition of the urosteges furnish zoological characters in many cases. Compare gastrostege.

urostegite (ū-rō-stē-jit), n. [< urostege + -ite.] One of the urosteges, or urostegal scales.

urosteon (ū-rō-stē-on), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ὀστέον, bone.] A median posterior ossification of the sternum of some birds, as Dicholophus cristatus, arising from an independent ossific center. W. K. Parker.

urosternite (ū-rō-stēr'nit), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + E. sternite.] The sternite, or ventral median sclerite, of any somite of the urosome of an arthropod. Compare urite. A. S. Packard.

urosthene (ū-rōs-thēn), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σθένος, strength.] In zool., an animal whose greatest strength is in the tail; an animal whose organization is comparatively large and strong in the caudal region of the body, as a cetacean or a sirenian.

urosthenic (ū-rōs-thēn'ik), a. [< urosthenē + -ic.] Strong in the tail, or caudal region of the body: said of an animal whose organization preponderates in size and strength in the hinder part of the body: opposed to prosthene.

Urosticta (ū-rō-stik'tē), n. [NL. (Gould, 1853).] A genus of humming-birds, with 2 Ecuadorian species, E. benjamini and E. ruficrissa, of small size, 3½ inches long, the bill ¾ to ⅞ of an inch, the tail emarginate, and the gorget luminous green with or without a violet spot, the general plumage green. They are known as white-tips.

urostylar (ū-rō-stī'lār), a. [< urostyle + -ar.] Of the nature of or pertaining to a urostyle: as, a urostylar bone or process.

urostyle (ū-rō-stīl), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + στυλος, column: see style.] A prolongation backward of the spinal column, especially of the last vertebra, in certain fishes and amphibians: in some Amphibia forming the greater part of the so-called sacrum, or a long bone in the axis of the spinal column behind the sacrum proper, and approximately coextensive with the length of the ilia.

urotoxic (ū-rō-tok'ik), a. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + τοξικόν, poison.] Of or pertaining to poisonous substances eliminated in the urine.

Drill or borer (Urosalpinx cinerea), enlarged one-half.

10. Limnoria asyriaca, about two thirds natural size.

now included in Ursus. It is now restricted to such species as the brown bear of Europe, U. arctos, and the grizzly and black bears of North America, U. horribilis and

American Black Bear Ursus americanus

U. americanus; for the polar bear, spectacled bear, sun-bear, and honey-bear (or sloth-bear) have been detached under the names of Thalassarchus, Tr. marctus, H. urctos, and Melursus (or Prochilus) respectively. See bear<sup>2</sup> (with cuts), and cuts under scapholunar and Plantigrada.

Urtica (ér' ti-kä), n. [NL. (Malpighi, 1675; Brunfels, 1530), < L. urtica, a nettle, so called from the stinging hairs, < urere, burn: see usition.] A genus of apetalous plants, the nettle type of the order Urticales and tribe Urticeae. It is characterized by opposite leaves furnished with stinging hairs and free or united stipules; by the fruit, a straight achene; and by its unisexual flowers, the pistillate with four unequal segments. There are about 30 species, widely scattered over most temperate and subtemperate regions. They are annuals or perennials, in a few species woody at the base. They bear petioled toothed or lobed leaves, usually with from five to seven nerves. The small and inconspicuous greenish twin flowers are borne in small clusters or panicles. For the species in general, see nettle; for U. ferox, see onyx-onyx. Nearly 400 former species are now classed elsewhere, especially under Laportea, Croera, Pilea, and Boehmeria. England has 3 species, 2 of which, U. dioica and U. urens, occur occasionally in the United States; 6 others are natives of the United States, 5 in the west and southwest, and 1, U. gracilis, a tall wand-like nettle of fence-rows and springy places, ranging eastward and northward from Colorado to the Atlantic.

Urticaceæ (ér-ti-ká'se-é), n. pl. [NL. (Dumortier, 1829), < Urtica + -acæ.] An order of apetalous plants, of the series Unisexuales, unlike all the other orders of the series, except the Euphorbiaceæ, in the frequently herbaceous habit and in the presence of a distinct free perianth. It bears cymose staminate flowers, the perianth free from the accompanying bract, with one-stamen opposite each lobe, or rarely fewer. The one-ellied ovary contains a single ovule, the style at first terminal, but usually soon left at one side by the oblique growth of the indehiscent fruit, which is commonly a small achene or drupe, or by consolidation a syncarp. The order includes about 1,500 species, belonging to 110 genera, widely dispersed through warm and temperate regions, and classed in 8 tribes, of which the types are Ulmus, Celtis, Cannabis, Morus, Artocarpus, Coccolophus, Urtica, and Thelygonum. A great diversity in habit, fruit, and milky juice occasioned a former dismemberment of the order into the separate orders Ulmaceæ, Celticæ, Moraceæ, Artocarpeæ, Urticaceæ, and Cannabineæ, respectively the elm, hackberry, mulberry, breadfruit, nettle, and hemp families, each coinciding nearly with the similar tribe now recognized. Among these tribes the Urticææ and about 6 other genera are principally herbaceous; the others are trees or shrubs, sometimes, as in the species of Ficus and Ulmus, reaching a great size. Their leaves are usually alternate, in outline entire, toothed, lobed, or palmately parted, and with deciduous stipules which often inclose the terminal bud. The inflorescence is primarily centripetal, but ultimately centrifugal, often in few-flowered clusters, sometimes forming a dense spike, raceme, or panicle, or with all the flowers closely massed on a fleshy receptacle. The order yields a number of edible fruits—as the fig, breadfruit, jackfruit, mulberry, and hackberry—in which the edible part may be either the ripened ovary, as the hackberry, or a fleshy calyx, as the mulberry, or the fleshy receptacle, as the fig, forming a syconium, or the thickened seed, as in species of Artocarpus. The order also includes several important dyewoods, as fustic; several ornamental as well as timber trees planted for shade or for hedges, as the elm, mulberry, and Osage orange; and many valuable fibers, as hemp and ramie. Species of some genera produce a narcotic resin, as hops and also hemp. (See hashish.) Several of the most notable trees belong here, as the banian, the bo-tree or sacred fig, the sycamore-fig, and the famed upas-tree of Java. (See Ficus and Antiaris.) In the tribes Moraceæ and Artocarpeæ, and especially in the genus Ficus, an acrid emetic or poisonous milky juice abounds, either white or yellowish, in many furnishing india-rubber, in others becoming resinous, and yielding a gum. In a few, the cow-trees, it is innocuous, and is used as a beverage. See also Pseudomedica, Broussonetia, Streblus, Zelkova, Planera, and Humulus.

urtical (êr'ti-kal), a. [Urtica + -al.] 1. In bot., of or belonging to the nettles; typified by the genus Urtica: as, the urtical alliance.

Lindley.—2. Stinging; capable of urticating; serving for urtication, as the trichocysts of infusorians. See trichocyst.

urticaria (ôr-ti-kă'ri-ä), n. [= F. urticaire, < NL. urtica, nettle-rash; < L. urtica, a nettle; see Urtica.] Nettle-rash; urticaria; hives. The disease is an eruption of wheals, occurring as an idiosyncrasy in some persons after eating shell-fish, certain fruits, or other food, and almost always dependent upon some gastric derangement. The wheals are indurated elevations of the skin, of varying size, whitish on the top (the swelling having forced the blood out of the capillaries of the skin), and surrounded by a reddened zone. They give rise to intense itching, especially when on the covered parts of the body. They appear suddenly and pass away with equal rapidity, one or more crops often coming and going in the course of a single day.

urticarial (ôr-ti-kă'ri-al), a. [Urticaria + -al.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with urticaria. Medical News, LII, 546.

urticarious (ôr-ti-kă'ri-us), a. [Urticaria + -ous.] Same as urticarial. Medical News, LII, 720.

urticate (ôr-ti-kât), v.; pret. and pp. urticated, ppr. urticating. [Urtica, < ML. urticatus, pp. of urticare (> OF. urtier; cf. It. urticuggiare), sting like a nettle, < L. urtica, a nettle; see Urtica.] I. trans. To sting like a nettle; nettle with stinging hairs; produce urtication in or of.

II. intrans. To have or exercise the faculty of urticating; effect urtication; sting.—Urticating batteries, capsule, filament. See battery, etc.—Urticating larva, a larva covered with spiny hairs, which have a stinging or nettling effect upon the skin of one handling it. See stinging caterpillar (with cut), under stinging.

urtication (ôr-ti-kă'shon), n. [= F. urtication; as urticate + -ion.] The action or result of urticating or stinging; a stinging or nettling operation or effect; specifically, the whipping of a benumbed or paralytic limb with nettles, in order to restore its feeling.

Urticæ (ôr-tis'ê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1805), < Urtica + -æ.] A tribe of plants, of the order Urticaceæ, typified by the genus Urtica, the nettles. It is characterized by usually unisexual flowers with one to five anthers reversed in the bud, inflexed filaments, an erect orthotropous ovule, and a straight embryo. It includes about 40 genera, classed in 5 subtribes, of which Urtica, Proseris, Elaeagnus, Paritaria, and Forskohlea are the types. For other genera, see Hedera, Pilea, and Laportea. They are mostly herbaceous plants, numerous both in the tropics and in temperate regions, occasionally, as in Urtica and Laportea, becoming trees. They are remarkable, in the typical subtribe, the Urticeæ, for their stinging hairs, and more or less in all for the presence of abundant cystoliths or masses of crystals embedded in the tissues, and usually of a definite aspect, as radiating, fusiform, linear, etc., which is characteristic of each genus.

urubitinga (ô-rô-bi-ting'gä), n. [Braz., < urubu, a vulture, + Tupi tinga, white, bright, beautiful.] The native name of some hawk or other bird of prey of South America. It is adopted in ornithology (a) as the specific name of an alleged species of Cathartes, related to the turkey-buzzard of North America, and (b) [cap.] as the generic name of a number of black-and-white hawks of the buteonine division of the family Falconidae. U. zonura of Brazil, etc., is the leading species; the anthracite hawk, U. anthracina, ranges from Central America northward into the United States. The genus was named as such by Lesson in 1836.

urubu (ô-rô-bô), n. [Braz.] One of the American vultures; a bird of the genus Cathartes or Catharista. The name is commonly applied, in ornithology, to the black vulture, or zopilote, the iribu of Azara, Catharista urubu of Vieillot, Fidur iota or Cathartes iota of some writers, now usually known as Catharista atrata. This resembles the common turkey-buzzard of the United States, but differs in the mode of feathering of the neck, proportions of wings and tail, shape of bill, etc. It inhabits the warmer parts of America, from latitude 40° S. to nearly 40° N., and is common in the southern United States as far north as the Carolinas. It is very voracious, and acts as an efficient scavenger in the towns, where it becomes semi-domesticated. See also cut under Cathartes.

urucuri (ô-rô-kô'ri), n. A Brazilian palm, Attalea urochloa. Its large oily nuts are burned for their smoke in curing Para india-rubber. Urucuri-iba is the name of Cocos coriata.

Uruguayan (ô-rô-gwă'an), a. and n. [Uruguay (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to Uruguay, a republic of South America, situated south of Brazil.

II. n. An inhabitant of Uruguay.

urus (û'rus), n. [NL., < L. urus = Gr. οἰσός, wild ox, from the Teut. name represented by OHG. ur = AS. ūr = Icel. urr, also in comp. OHG. urohso, etc.; see ure3 and urochs.] 1. A kind of wild bull described by Cæsar; the mountain-bull, which ran wild in Gaul at the period of the Roman invasion, but has long been extinct. This is the Bos urus, or B. primigenius, of naturalists, and is also called camoscio, ur, ure, and ure ox. The urus had long spreading horns, unlike the European bison (Bison bonasus) or aurochs, and more like ordinary cattle, of which B. primigenius is a presumed ancestral form; but by some misunderstanding the name urus has also been attached to the aurochs, a few individuals of which still linger wild, but under protection, in the forests of Lithuania. It has been thought, erroneously, that the "Chillingham cattle," such as exist in confinement at Chillingham in Northumberland, England, and Hamilton in Lanarkshire, Scotland, are descendants of the animal described by Cæsar. See cut under aurochs.

2. [cap.] A genus of Boridae, including the aurochs and extinct bisons: therefore equivalent to Bison as now employed. Bojanius, 1827; Owen, 1843.—3. A kind of fossil ox from Eschscholtz Bay, Alaska. Buckland, 1831.

urva (ôr'vâ), n. [NL. urva, from an E. Ind. name.] 1. The crab-eating ichneumon of India, Herpestes urva, of a black color, the hairs annulated with white, and with a white stripe on the side of the head.—2. [cap.] A generic name of such ichneumons, of which there are 3 Asiatic species, as U. canerivora. B. R. Hodgson.

urved (êr'vd), a. [Appar. an error for curved.] In her., turned or bowed upward. Berry.

us<sup>1</sup> (us), pron. The objective case of we.

U. S. An abbreviation of United States (of America).

U. S. A. An abbreviation (a) of United States of America, and (b) of United States Army.

usable (û'zä-bl), a. [Also usable; < us + -able.] Capable of being used.

A lame carriage-horse threw everything into sad uncertainty. It might be weeks, it might be only a few days, before the horse was usable. Jane Austen, Emma, xlii.

usableness (û'zä-bl-nes), n. The character of being usable. Also spelled usableness.

usage (û'zäj), n. [ME. usage, < OF. (and F.) usage = Fr. usage = Sp. usaje = It. usaggio, < ML. usathum, usage, < L. usus, use; see use.] 1 Use; enjoyment.

Kept her to his usage and his store.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2337.

2. The act of using.

Not be thou usageful, like a handled bee,
And lose thy life by usage of thy sting.
Tennyson, The Ancient Sage.

3. Mode of using or treating; treatment.

Deliver what you are, and how you came To this sad cave, and what your usage was?
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, iii. 4.

As I promis'd
On your arrival, you have met no usage
Deserves repentance in your being here.
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, iv. 3.

Base was his usage, vile his whole employ,
And all despised and fed the pliant boy.
Crabbe, The Parish Register (Works, I. 64).

4. Long-continued use or practice; customary way of acting; habitual use; custom; practice: as, the ancient usage of Parliament. Technically, in English law, usage has a different signification from custom, in not implying immemorial existence or general prevalence. In earlier times custom was defined as a law created or evidenced by immemorial usage. Some American writers use the terms as practically equivalent, except in regarding usage as the facts by which the existence of custom is proved; others treat usage as the habit of individuals or classes, such as those engaged in a particular trade or business, and custom as the habit of communities or localities.

Afterward, as is the right usage,
The lords all to hir dede homage.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 251.

Usage confirm'd what Fancy had begun.
Prior, Henry and Emma.

Usages, no matter of what kind, which circumstances have established . . . become sanctified.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 522.

The custom of making their own Ordinances—like the Usages of a Corporation, the "Customary" of a Manor, . . . or the "Bye-laws" of a Parish—is but another illustration of the old common law of England.

English Glöds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. xxxviii.

5. Established or customary mode of employing a particular word, phrase, or construction; current locution.

The more closely one looks into usage, the firmer must be one's conviction that its adjudications have greatly more of freedom and elasticity than find countenance with mere word-fanciers.

F. Hall, Modern English, Pref.

6 Manners; behavior; conduct. Spencer, F. Q., IV. vii. 45.

He is able with his tongue and usage to deceive and abuse the wisest man that is.

Harman, Caveat for Cursetors, p. 51.

By usage, customarily; regularly.

They helde hem payed of fruites that they ete,
Which that the felde gave hem by usage.

Chaucer, Former Age, l. 4.

Law and usage of Parliament. See parliamentary law, under parliamentary. The usages, certain forms and rites in the celebration of the eucharist maintained by some of the nonjuring clergy in England and Scotland—namely, the mixed chalice, the invocation and oblation in the prayer of consecration, and distinct and separate prayer for the departed. Those who supported the usages were called usagers, and their opponents non-usagers. All the usages were enjoined in the nonjurors' communion office of 1718. The liturgical forms were authorized in the Scottish communion office of 1764, and the mixed chalice became an established custom. See nonjuror.—Usages of war. See war.—Syn. 4. Habit, Manner, etc. See custom.

usager (û'zä-jër), n. [F. usager, < usage, usage; see usage.] 1. One who has the use of anything in trust for another. Daniel.—2. One of a party which maintained the usages (see phrase under usage) among the English nonjurors and in the Scottish Episcopal Church.

usance (û'zans), n. [ME. usauce, < OF. usance, < usant, using; see usant.] 1 Using; use; employment.

By this discriminative usance or sanctification of things sacred the name of God is honoured and sanctified.

Joseph Mede, Diatribes, p. 60.

But why do you call this benefit made of our money usury and madness? It is but usance, and husbanding of our stock.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 281.

2 Use; custom.

As was her usance

To forthren every wight, and doon plesaunce

Of veray bounte and of courtesye.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1476.

3 Premium paid for the use of money loaned; interest.

He lends out money gratis and brings down

The rate of usance. Shak., M. of V., I. 3. 46.

4. The time which is allowed by custom or usage for the payment of bills of exchange drawn on a distant country. The length of the usance varies in different places from fourteen days to six months after the date of the bill, and the bill may be drawn at usance, half usance, double usance, etc. In recent years a four months' usance has been established for India, China, Japan, etc.

usant (û'zant), a. [ME. usant, < OF. usant, ppr. of usar, use; see use.] Using; accustomed.

A theef he was of corn and eek of mele,

And that a sly and usant [var. usyn] for to stele.

Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 20.

usancet, usaunt. Old spellings of usance, usant.

Usbeg, n. See Uzbeg.

uscheri, n. An old spelling of usher.

Uscock (us'kok), n. [= G. pl. Uskok, Serbo-Croatian fugitives.] One of the dwellers in Serbia and Bosnia who about the beginning of the sixteenth century settled in Dalmatia and neighboring regions, on account of the Turkish invasions.

use<sup>1</sup> (üs), n. [ME. use, uce, us, < OF. us, uz = Pr. us = Sp. Ig. uso, < L. usus, use, experience, discipline, skill, habit, custom, < uti, pp. usus, OL. oeti, pp. oesus, use, employ, exercise, perform, enjoy, etc.; cf. Skt. ûta, pp. of √ av, favor. Hence ult. use, v., usage, usual, usurp, usury, utensil, utilize, utility; abuse, peruse; disuse, misuse, etc.] 1. The act of employing anything, or the state of being employed; employment; application; conversion to a purpose, especially a profitable purpose.

This word habbeth muchel on vs. Ancren Ricle, p. 16.

The fat of the beast that dieth of itself . . . may be used in any other use. Lev. vii. 24.

I know not what use to put her to.

 ros = It. uopo, profit, advantage, use, need, < L.*

opus, work, labor, need, AL. use, in legal sense:
see opus. The word use<sup>2</sup> has been confused with use<sup>1</sup>, with which it is now practically identical.]

In law, the benefit or profit (with power to direct disposal) of property—technically of lands and tenements—in the possession of another who simply holds them for the beneficiary; the equitable ownership of lands the legal title to which is in another. He to whose use or benefit the trust is intended enjoys the use of profits, and is called cestui que use. Since the Statute of Uses, the gift or grant of real property to the use of a person transfers to him directly the legal title; and the term trust is now commonly used to denote the kind of estate formerly signified by use, so far as the law now permits it to exist. (See trust, 5.)
 Uses apply only to lands of inheritance; no use can subsist of leaseholds.

And use is a trust or confidence reposed in some other.
 Sir E. Coke, Com. on Littleton, 272 b.

Use seems to be an older word than trust. Its first occurrence in statute law is in 7 Ric. II. c. 12, in the form apa. In Littleton "confidence" is the word employed. The Statute of Uses seems to regard use, trust, and confidence as synonymous. According to Bacon, it was its permanency that distinguished the use from the trust.

Donne, Letters, vii.
 Pious uses, religious uses; more specifically, that class of religious uses which was not condemned by the law as superstitious.—Public use. See public.—Religious uses, uses or trusts for the propagation of religion, the support of religious institutions, or the performance of religious rites.—Resulting use. See result, v. 4.—Secondary use. Same as shifting use. Shifting use, a use or trust properly created for the benefit of one person, but so as to pass from him upon a specified contingency and vest wholly or in part in another. Thus, if A enfeoffed B to the use of C and his heirs, but if C should die or should inherit another estate in the lifetime of A, then to D and his heirs, the occurrence of the contingency would cause the use (and therefore, under the Statute of Uses, the legal title) to shift from C to D.—Springing use, the creation of an estate so as to arise (spring into effect) on a future event, after an estate enjoyed by the grantor, by means of a feoffment or conveyance under the Statute of Uses.

—Statute of charitable uses. See statute.—Statute of Uses, an English statute of 1536 (27 Hen. VIII. c. 10) against uses and against devising lands by will (a practice which tended to defeat feudal dues), and intended to give the legal estate or absolute ownership to those who are entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of land. The principal clause enacted that thereafter whoever should have a use, confidence, or trust in any hereditaments should be deemed and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate, and possession of the same estate that he had in use—that is, that he, instead of the nominal grantee or trustee, should become the full legal owner. This principle has been adopted by provisions, known by the same title, in the legislation of most of the United States.—Superstitious uses, such religious uses as were condemned by English law at or after the Reformation as maintaining superstition, in which were included the providing of masses for the dead, etc. In the United States, generally, no restriction is placed upon uses for these purposes as such, all religious tenets not involving any contravention of the criminal law being on an equal footing; but trusts for such purposes are required to conform to the same rules as trusts for charitable or other secular uses, in respect to the existence of a competent corporate trustee and a defined or ascertainable object.—Use and occupation, the enjoyment of possession or the holding of real property belonging to another without a written lease, but under circumstances implying a liability to make compensation in the nature of rent.—Use plaintiff, a person beneficially interested in a claim, and for whose use or benefit an action is brought thereon in the name of another, as in the name of an apparent owner, or in the name of the state.

useable, useableness. See usable, usability.
usee (ū-zē'), n. [< use<sup>2</sup> + -ee.] A person for whose use a suit is brought in the name of another. [Rare.]

useful (ūs'fūl), a. [< use<sup>1</sup> + -ful.] Being of use, advantage, or profit; valuable for use; suited or adapted to a purpose; producing or having power to produce good; beneficial; profitable; serviceable.

The Scot, because he hath always been an useful Confederate to France against England, hath (among other Privileges) Right of Pre-emption or first choice of Wines in Bourdeaux. Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

Useful invention. See invention. Syn. Advantageous, serviceable, helpful, available, salutary.

usefully (ūs'fūl-i), adv. In a useful manner; profitably; beneficially; in such a manner as to effect or advance some end.

usefulness (ūs'fūl-nes), n. The state or character of being useful; conduciveness to some end; utility; serviceableness; advantage.

useless (ūs'les), a. [< use + -less.] Having no use; being of no use; unserviceable; usable to no good end; answering no valuable purpose; not advancing the end proposed; unprofitable; ineffectual.

Where none admire, 'tis useless to excel.

An idler is a watch that wants both hands,
As useless if it goes as when it stands.

—Syn. Useless, Fruitless, Ineffectual, Unavailing, bootless, profitless, unprofitable, valueless, worthless, futile, abortive. Useless often implies that the cause of failure lies in the situation: as, it is useless to try to mend that clock. Useless is the only one of these words that may thus be applied by anticipation to what might be attempted. That which is fruitless, ineffectual, or unavailing actually fails, and from hindrances external to itself. Unavailing is more likely to be used than fruitless or ineffectual where the failure is through some one's unwillingness: as, unavailing prayers or petitions, ineffectual efforts, fruitless labors. Fruitless is stronger and more final than ineffectual or unavailing.

uselessly (ūs'les-li), adv. In a useless manner; without profit or advantage.

uselessness (ūs'les-nes), n. The state or character of being useless; unserviceableness; unfitness for any valuable purpose or for the purpose intended.

user<sup>1</sup> (ū-zēr), n. [< ME. user; < use<sup>1</sup> + -er<sup>1</sup>.] One who or that which uses.

Yf ther be eny wyndowes, dorres, or holes of newe made in to the yeld walle, wherthorow eny persone may se, here, or have knowlech what ys done in the seid halle, that it so stopyd by the doers or versers therof, upon payne of xiii. s. iiiij. d. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 387.

And, kept unused, the user so destroys it.

user<sup>2</sup> (ū-zēr), n. [< OF. user, inf. as noun: see use, v.] In law, the using or exercise, as of a right; continued use or enjoyment; the acting in a manner which implies a claim of right so to do. See non-user.—Adverse user, such a use of property as the owner himself would exercise, disregarding the claims of others entirely, asking permission from no one, and using the property under a claim of right. Mitchell, J., 120 Jud. Rep., p. 598.—Right of user. (a) The right to use, as distinguished from ownership. (b) The presumptive right arising from continued user.

ush (ush), v. t. [A back-formation, < usher.] To usher. [Obsolete or colloq.]

If he winna fee to me

usherance (ush'ér-ans), n. [< usher + -ance.] The act of ushering, or the state of being ushered in; introduction. Shaftesbury, Characteristics, iii.

usherdom (ush'ér-dum), n. [< usher + -dom.] The functions or power of ushers; ushership; also, ushers collectively. Quarterly Rev. [Rare.]

usherian (u-shē'ri-an), a. [< usher + -ian.] Pertaining to, or performed or directed by, an usher. [Rare.]

Certain powers were . . . delegated to . . . beings called Ushers. The usherian rule had . . . always been comparatively light. Disraeli, Vivian Grey, i. iv.

usherless (ush'ér-les), a. [< usher + -less.] Destitute of an usher or ushers.

Where usherless, both day and night, the North,
South, East, and West winds enter and go forth.

ushership (ush'ér-ship), n. [< usher + -ship.] The office of an usher.

usitate (ū'zi-tāt), a. [< L. usitatus, used, usual, pp. of usitari, use often, freq. of uti, pp. usus, use: see use<sup>1</sup>.] Used; usual; customary.

He [Hooper] borrowed from Laski, or from Zurich, the new or revived title of superintendent, and with this he decorated certain of his clergy, whom he set above the rest, despising, it would seem, the usitate dignities of rural deans and archdeacons.

Ustilaginæ (us'ti-lā-jin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ustilago (-gin-) + -æ.] An extensive order of zygomycetous fungi, the smuts, parasitic in the tissues of living plants, especially flowering plants, causing much damage, particularly to the grasses. The mycelium is widely spreading, but soon vanishes. The teliospores are produced in the interior of mycelial branches, which often become gelatinized. The life-history begins with the production from the resting-spore of a promycelium which bears sporid-like gametes. These gametes conjugate in pairs, and directly, or by means of sporidia, produce a new mycelium, which in turn bears the resting-spores in another host. Ustilago, Urocystis, and Tilletia are the most important genera. See Coniomyces, smut, 3, Fungi.

ustilagineous (us'ti-lā-jin'ē-us), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the Ustilaginæ.

ustilaginous (us-ti-laj'i-nus), a. [< Ustilago (-gin-) + -ous.] 1. Affected with ustilago; smutty.—2. Belonging to the Ustilaginæ.

Ustilago (us-ti-lā'gō), n. [NL., < LL. ustilago (-gin-), a plant of the thistle kind; prob., like urtica, < urere (√ us), burn: see ustion. The name is applied to smut as looking 'burnt' or blackened by fire.] 1. A genus of parasitic fungi, the type of the order Ustilaginæ, causing, under the name of smut, some of the most destructive of the fungus-diseases of plants. The teliospores are simple, produced in the interior of much-gelatinized swollen hyphæ, and when mature forming pulverulent, frequently ill-smelling masses. See smut, 3, maize-smut, chimney-sweep, 3, burnt, colly-brand, collarbags, coal-brand.

2. [l. c.] Smut. See smut, 3.

ustoriosis (us-tō'ri-us), a. [< L. ustor, a burner (of dead bodies), < urere, burn.] Having the property of burning.

The power of a burning-glass is by an ustoriosis quality in the mirror or glass, arising from certain unknown substantial form. Watts.

usurpress† (ū-zēr'pres), n. [< usurper + -ess.] A female usurper. Howell, Vocal Forrest, p. 19.
usury (ū'zhō-rī), n. [Early mod. E. also usury; < ME. usurie, usury; < OF. usurie, a collateral form of OF. usure, interest, usury; see usure.] 1. Originally, any premium paid, or stipulated to be paid, for the use of money; interest. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then, at my coming, I should have received mine own with usury. Mat. xxv. 27.

2. An excessive or inordinate premium paid, or stipulated to be paid, for the use of money borrowed; any such premium in excess of the rate established or permitted by law, which varies locally.

I send you herewith the pylon for the male, and Xs. for the hyer, whyche is usury, I tak God to record. Paston Letters, III. 110.

3. The practice of lending money at interest, or of taking interest for money lent; specifically, and now almost exclusively, the practice of taking exorbitant or excessive interest; the taking of extortionate interest from the needy or extravagant.

Their [the Jews'] only studies are Divinity and Physick: their occupations, brokerage and usury.

Sandys, Travails (1652), p. 115.

The root of the condemnation of usury was simply an error in political economy. Lecky, European Morals, I. 94.

usus (ū'sus), n. [L.] Use; specifically, in Rom. law, the right to enjoy the use, fruits, and products of a thing personally, without transferring them to others. It usually implied actual possession—that is, the right to detain the thing; but the legal possession was in the owner who held subject to usus. More specifically, usus was the lower form of civil marriage, in which the wife was regarded as coming into the possession or under the hand of the husband, as if a daughter.—Usus loquendi, usage in speaking; the established usage of a certain language or class of speakers.

U. S. V. An abbreviation of United States Volunteers.

usward (us'wārd), adv. [< us + -ward.] Toward us. [Rare.]

ut (ūt), n. [See gamut.] In solmization, the syllable once generally used for the first tone or key-note of the scale. It is now commonly superseded, except in France, by do. See solmization and dot.

Uta (ū'tā), n. [NL. (Baird and Girard, 1852), < Utah, one of the Territories of the United States.] A genus of very small American lizards of the family Iguanidae, nearly related both to Holbrookia and to Sceloporus. There are several species, as U. elegans, U. stansburiana, U. ornata, etc., inhabiting western regions of the United States, as from Utah southward.

Utania (ū-tā-mā'ni-ā), n. [NL. (Leach, 1816), also Utania.] A genus of Alcedo, whose type is the razor-billed auk, Alca or Utania torda, chiefly differing from Alca proper in having the wings sufficiently developed for flight. See cut under razorbill.

utasi, utis; (ū'tas, ū'tis), n. [Also utass, utat; < ME. utas, < OF. utes, utas, utus, utaves, oitaves, oitaves, F. octaves, the octave of a festival, pl. of octave, octave, = Sp. Pg. octava = It. ottava, an octave; < L. octavus (dis): see octave.] 1. The octave of a festival, a legal term, or other particular occasion—that is, the space of eight days after it, or the last day of that space of time: as, the utis of Saint Hilary.

Quod Gawein, . . . "let vs sette the day of spousesalle;" and than toke thei day to-geder the utis after, and com thus spekyng in to the halle.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 449.

uteri, n. Plural of uterus.

uterine (ū'te-rin), a. [= F. utérin = Sp. Pg. It. uterino, < L. L. uterinus, born of the same mother, lit. of the (same) womb, < L. uterus, womb: see uterus.] 1. Of or pertaining to the uterus or womb: as, uterine complaints.—2. Born of the same mother, but by a different father.

He [Francis Bacon] had a uterine brother, Anthony Bacon, who was a very great statesman, and much beyond his brother Francis for the Politicks.

Aubrey, Lives (Francis Bacon).

Uterine artery, a branch of the anterior division of the internal iliac artery, very tortuous in its course along the side of the uterus between the layers of the broad ligament, giving off numerous branches, which ramify on the anterior and posterior surfaces and in the substance of the uterus.—Uterine cake. See placenta, 1 (a).—Uterine gestation, plexus, sinus. See the nouns.—Uterine sac, in ascidians, the shortened and widened oviduct, containing the ovarian follicle and ovum. Its oviducal part is applied to the wall of the oviduct, or incubatory pouch, while the other or inner half contains the ovum.—Uterine soufflé. Same as placental soufflé (which see, under placenta).—Uterine tubes, tympanites, vellum. See the nouns.

uterocopulatory (ū'te-rō-kop'ū-lā-tō-rī), a. Vaginal or copulatory, as certain sexual passages of hermaphrodite gastropods: correlated with uterodeferent.

uterodeferent (ū'te-rō-def'ēr-ent), a. Oviducal or deferent, as certain sexual passages of hermaphrodite gastropods: correlated with uterocopulatory.

uterogestation (ū'te-rō-jes-tā'shon), n. [< L. uterus, uterus, + gestatio(n)-, gestation.] Gestation in the womb from conception to birth.

uteromania (ū'te-rō-mā'ni-ā), n. Nymphomania.

uterus (ū'te-rus), n.; pl. uteri (-rī). [= F. utérus = Sp. útero = Pg. It. utero, < L. uterus, also uter and uterum, the womb, belly; cf. Gr. úterōn, the womb: see hysteria.] 1. The womb; that part of the female sexual passage to which a ripe ovum is conveyed from the ovary, and in which it is detained in gestation until the fetus is matured and expelled in parturition. It is a section of an oviduct, originally a Mullerian duct, enlarged, thickened, united with its fellow of the opposite side, or otherwise modified, to serve as a resting-place for the ovum while this is developed to or toward maturity as an embryo or a fetus, whence it is then discharged through a cloaca or a vagina. The uterus is single in most Monodelphia, and double in Didelphia and Ornithodelphia. When united,

u, uterus; ds, its decidua serotina; du, decidua reflexa, that part of the decidua serotina which is reflected over the ovum, and consequently envelops the chorion; ch, chorion, or outermost fetal envelop proper (originally the cell-wall of the ovum), lined by am, the amion, or innermost fetal envelop, in the cavity of which the fetus floats in the liquor amnii; nb, the already shrunk umbilical vesicle lying between the amion and the chorion; al, allantois, forming the navel-string, or umbilical cord, and the fetal part of the placenta; c, cervix, or os tincte, most of which enter into the formation of the placenta; os, os tincte, or mouth of the womb.

but incompletely, it constitutes a uterus bicornis, or two-horned womb. In birds the name uterus is given to that terminal part of the oviduct where the egg is detained to receive its shell. The non-pregnant human uterus is a pear-shaped organ about 3 inches long, with a broad, flattened part above (the body), and a narrow, more cylindrical part below (the cervix). Within is a cavity which passes out into the Fallopian tube on each side above, and below opens into the vagina. The cavity narrows as it passes into the cervix at the internal os, and continues downward as the cervical canal, to terminate at the external os uteri or os tincte. The uterus is supported by the broad ligament, a transverse fold of peritoneum which embraces it on each side, and by accessory ligaments, such as the round, vesico-uterine, and recto-uterine ligaments. It consists of a serous or peritoneal coat, a middle coat of smooth muscular fibers, forming most of its thickness, and an epithelial lining. See also cut under peritoneum.

bule of the membranous labyrinth of the ear (the smaller one being the sacculus), lodged in the fovea hemispherical, of oval and laterally compressed shape, communicating with the openings of the membranous semicircular canals, and indirectly also with the sacculus. Also called sacculus communis, sacculus hemisphæricus, sacculus semioralis, utriculus vestibuli.—3. In bot., a seed-vessel consisting of a very thin loose pericarp, inclosing a single seed; any thin bottle-like or bladder-like body, as the perigynium of Carex. See cuts under Sarcobatus and Perigynium. Also utriculus in all senses.—Internal or primordial utricule. See primordial. Utricle of the urethra. utricular (ū-trik'ū-lār), a. [= F. utriculaire = Sp. Pg. utricular; cf. L. utricularius, a bagpiper, a ferryman, lit. pertaining to a bag, < L. utriculus, a leather bag; see utricule.] 1. Of or pertaining to a utricule, in any sense; resembling a utricule; forming a utricule, or having utricles.—2. Resembling a utricule or bag; specifically applied in chemistry to the condition of certain substances, as sulphur, the vapor of which, on coming in contact with cold bodies, condenses in the form of globules, composed of a soft external pellicle filled with liquid.

Utricularia (ū-trik'ū-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. utriculus, a bag; see utricule.] A remarkable genus of plants, the bladderworts, the type of the order Lentibulariæ, once known as Lentibularia (Rivinus, 1690). They are characterized by having a two-part calyx with entire segments. The genus comprises about 160 species, or nearly the entire order, principally tropical, and American or Australian, some of them widely distributed over the world. Their characteristic habit is that of elongated floating rootless stems, clothed with close whorls of capillary and repeatedly forking green leaves, by some considered as branches, in most cases elegantly dissected and fringe-like. These become massed together at the apex into a small, bright-green roundish ball or winter-bud. The flowers are solitary or racemed, two-lipped, strongly personate and spurred, usually yellow, and borne on mostly naked scapes projecting from the water; they resemble otherwise those of the other personate orders, but have a globose free central placenta, like the Primulaceæ. Most species produce great numbers of small, obliquely ovoid bladders, formed of a thin, delicate membrane, opening at the smaller end by a very elastic valvular lid, and covered within by projecting quadrifid processes, serving as absorbent organs, and each composed of four divergent arms mounted on a short pedicel. The bladders serve, like various appendages in other insectivorous plants, for the absorption of soft animal matter, forming traps for minute water-insects, larvae, entomostracans, and tardigrades. Other species are terrestrial, growing upon moist earth, and often bearing a rosette of linear or spatulate leaves, or sometimes covered with bladders, as the aquatic species. A few species are epiphytes, and produce bladders on multifid rhizomes, as in U. montana of tropical America. In this and several other species the plant also forms numerous tubers, which serve as reservoirs of water, and enable these, unlike all other species, to grow in dry places. There are 14 species in the United States, of which U. vulgaris is the most widely distributed. U. claudens, a common coast species, bears numerous globose whitish cistigamous flowers, besides the normal ones, which are broadly personate and yellow. Two species, chiefly of the Atlantic coast, U. purpurea and U. resupinata, are exceptional in their purple flowers. U. nelumbifolia of Brazil is singular in its growing only in water lodged in the dilated leaf-bases of a large Tillandsia, and propagating not only by seeds, but also by runners, which grow from one host plant to the next.

utriculi, n. Plural of utriculus.

utriculiferous (ū-trik'ū-lif'ē-rus), a. [L. utriculus, a little bag, + ferre = F. bear.] In bot., bearing or producing utricles or bladders.

utriculiform (ū-trik'ū-li-fōrm), a. [L. utriculus, a little bag (see utricule), + forma, form; see form.] In bot., having the form of a utricule; utricular.

utriculoid (ū-trik'ū-loid), a. [L. utriculus, a little bag, + Gr. -oidēs, form.] Same as utriculiform.

utriculose (ū-trik'ū-lōs), a. [L. utriculus, a little bag; see utricule.] In bot., same as utricular.

utriculus (ū-trik'ū-lus), n.: pl. utriculi (-lī). [NL.; see utricule.] In anat., zool., and bot., same as utricule.

The differences which are seen in it are partly due to the way in which the two cavities of the vestibule, the utriculus and sacculus, are connected together, and to the course taken by the semicircular canals which spring from the former. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 335.

Utriculus hominis, utriculus masculinus. Same as uterus masculinus. See prostatic vesicle, under prostatic.

Utriculus prostaticus. Same as prostatic sinus (which see, under prostatic).—Utriculus urethre, the prostatic vesicle.—Utriculus vestibuli. Same as utricule, 2.

utriform (ū'tri-fōrm), a. [L. uter, a leather bottle, + forma, form.] Shaped like a leather bottle.

They may be leathern-bottle-shaped (utriform).

Stay, sister, I would utter to you a business,

But I am very loath.

Webster, Devil's Law-Case, iii. 3.

In reason's ear they all rejoice,

And utter forth a glorious voice.

Addison, Ode, Spectator, No. 465.

4. In law, to deliver, or offer to deliver, as an unlawful thing for an unlawful purpose. = Syn. 3. Utter, Enunciate, Pronounce, Deliver, express, broach. Utter is the most general of the italicized words; it applies to any audible voice; as, to utter a sigh, a shriek, an exclamation. The rest apply to words. Enunciate expresses careful utterance, meaning that each sound or word is made completely audible; as, enunciate your words distinctly. Pronounce applies to units of speech; as, he cannot pronounce the letter "r"; he pronounces his words indistinctly; he pronounced an oration at the grave; he pronounced the sentence of death: the last two of these imply a solemn and formal utterance. Deliver refers to the whole speech, including not only utterance, but whatever there may be of help from skillful management of the voice, gesture, etc.: as, "a poor speech well delivered is generally more effective than a good speech badly delivered." Deliver still has, however, sometimes its old sense of simply uttering or making known in any way.

utter (ut'ēr), adv. [L. ut, a.] 1. Outside; on the outside; out.

The portir with his pikis tho put him utere,

And warned him the wicket while the wache durid.

Sandys, Travaux, p. 47.

utterable (ut'ēr-a-bl), a. [L. ut + -able.] Capable of being uttered, pronounced, or expressed.

He hath changed the ineffable name into a name utterable by man, and desirable by all the world.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 53.

utterableness (ut'ēr-a-bl-nes), n. The character of being utterable.

utterance (ut'ēr-āns), n. [L. ut + -ance.]

1. The act of uttering. (a) A putting forth; disposal by sale or otherwise; circulation.

What of our comodities haue most uttrance there, and what prices will be giuen for them.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 300.

But the English have so ill utterance for their warm clothes in these hot countries. Sandys, Travaux, p. 95.

(b) The act of sounding or expressing with the voice; vocal expression; also, power of speaking; speech.

Where so euer knowledge doth accompanie the witte, there best uttrance doth alwaies awaite vpon the tongue.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 29.

They . . . began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them uttrance.

Barrel-organ utterance, the involuntary repetition of a word or phrase just uttered by the speaker or another; echolalia. See also recurring utterance.—Recurring utterances. See recurring.—Scanning utterance. Same as syllabic utterance.—Staccato utterance. Same as syllabic utterance.—Syllabic utterance, a defect in speech consisting in an inability to enunciate as a whole a word of more than one syllable, in consequence of which each syllable must be sounded independently as a separate word.

utterance² (ut'ēr-āns), n. [An expanded form, due to confusion with utter, utmost, of **ut-trance*, uttrance, earlier outrance; see outrance.] The last or utmost extremity; the bitter end; death.

Come fate into the list,

And champion me to the uttrance!

Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1. 72.

utterer (ut'ēr-ēr), n. [L. ut, v. + -er.] One who utters. Specifically—(a) One who disposes of, by sale or otherwise.

Utterers of fish, maintained chiefly by fishing.

Prize Council (Arber's Eng. Garner, T. 301).

1. This character, the twenty-second in our alphabet, is (see V) the older form of the character U, having been long used equivalently with the latter, and only recently strictly distinguished from it as the representative of a different sound. The words beginning respectively with U and V, like those beginning with I and J, were, till not many years ago, mingled together in dictionaries. In our present practice, V represents always and in all situations a fricative sound, corresponding as sonant or voiced utterance to f as surd or breathed; it is the rustling made by forcing the intimated breath out between the surface of the lower lip and the edges of the upper front teeth, laid closely upon it. A purely labial v (as f: see F), made without aid from the teeth, is found in some languages. This sound is also almost the exclusive property of the v-sign: the number of words, as Stephen, nephew, in which it is written otherwise is extremely small, and in these words the ph is an etymological "restoration" (the old and normal English forms being Steven, newe). It is a frequent element in our utterance, making on an average over two and a third per cent. of it (the f-sound only two per cent.). As initial, it is almost solely of Romanic (French-Latin) origin, altered in pronunciation from the semi-vowel or w-sound, which belonged to the same sign in Roman use (see W). At the end of a word (where, however, it is never written without a following e), it is found in many words of Germanic origin, often alternating with its surd counterpart f, as in wife, wives, half, halve, etc.

2. As a Roman numeral, V stands for 5: with a dash over it (V), 5,000.—3. [V. c.] An abbreviation of velocity (in physics); verb; verse; versus (in law); vert (in heraldry); vision (in medicine); of verte, violino, vocal, and volta (in music); of ventral (fin), etc.—4. The chemical symbol of vanadium.

V<sup>2</sup> (vē), n. [From the letter V.] A five-dollar bill: so called from the character V which is conspicuous upon it. [Colloq., U. S.]

va (vā). [Va (= F. va), go, go on, also vada (< L. vadere, go), used as impv. 2d pers. sing. of vadere = F. aller, go: see vade.] In music, go on; continue: as, va crescendo, go on increasing the strength of tone; va rallentando, continue dragging the time.

vaagmar (vāg'mār), n. [Ice. vāg-meri, a kind of flounder, 'wave-mare,' < vāg, wave (see vaw), + meri, mare: see mare.] The deal-fish.

vaalite (vā'lit), n. [*Fa*al, a river in South Africa, + -ite.] A kind of vermiculite occasionally found associated with the diamond at the diggings in South Africa. It is probably an altered form of a mica (biotite) belonging to the original peridotite.

vacancer (vā'kəns), n. [F. vacance = Sp. Pg. vacancia = It. vacanza, vacanza, < ML. vacantia, empty place, vacancy, vacation, < L. vacan(t)-s, empty, vacant: see vacant.] Vacation. [Obsolete Scotch.]

The constitory had no vacance at this Yool, but had little to do.

vacancy (vā'kan-si), n.; pl. vacancies (-siz). [As vacance (see -cy).] 1. The state of being vacant, empty, or unoccupied.

The inquisitive, in my opinion, are such merely from a vacancy in their own imaginations.

2. Specifically, emptiness of mind; idleness; listlessness.

All dispositions to idleness or vacancy, even before they grow habits, are dangerous.

At chesse they will play all the day long, a sport that agreeth well with their sedentary vacancy.

3. That which is vacant or unoccupied. Specifically—(a) Empty space.

Alas, how is't with you,
That you do bend your eye on vacancy?

(b) An intermediate space; a gap; a chasm.

In the vacancy
'Twixt the wall and me.

Browning, Mesmerism.

(c) An interval of time not devoted to the ordinary duties or business of life; unoccupied, unemployed, or leisure time; holiday time; vacation; relaxation.

No interim, not a minute's vacancy.

Shak., T. N., v. 1. 98.

In his youth he had no Teachers, in his middle Age so little vacancy from the Wars and the cares of his Kingdom.

Milton, Hist. Eng., v.

(d) An unoccupied or unfilled post, position, or office: as, a vacancy in the judicial bench.

We went to see the Conclave, where, during vacancy, the Cardinals are shut up till they are agreed upon a new election.

Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 18, 1645.

vacant (vā'kant), a. [Early mod. E. also vacant; < ME. vacant, < OF. (and F.) vacant = Sp. Pg. It. vacante, < L. vacan(t)-s, empty, vacant, pp. of vacare, be empty, free, or unoccupied: see vacate.] 1. Having no contents: empty; unfilled; void; devoid; destitute: as, a vacant space; a vacant room.

Being of those virtues vacant.

Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 1. 126.

A man could not perceive any vacant or wast place under the Alps, but all beset with vines.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 81.

2. Not occupied or filled with an incumbent or tenant; unoccupied.

Special dignities, which vacant lie
For thy best use and wearing.

Shak., T. of A., v. 1. 145.

By . . . [Pelham's] death, the highest post to which an English subject can aspire was left vacant.

Macaulay, William Pitt.

3. Not engaged or filled with business or care; unemployed; unoccupied; free; disengaged; idle: as, vacant hours.

Alexander, in times vacant from bataille, delyted in that maner huntinge. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 18.

The loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind.

Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 122.

Absence of occupation is not rest;

A mind quite vacant is a mind distress'd.

Cowper, Retirement, l. 624.

4. Characterized by or proceeding from idleness or absence of mental occupation.

Every morning waked us to a repetition of toil; but the evening repaid it with vacant hilarity. Goldsmith, Vicar, v.

5. Free from thought; not given to thinking, study, reflection, or the like; thoughtless.

You, who used to be so gay, so open, so vacant!

Steele, Conscious Lovers, ii. 1.

6. Lacking, or appearing to lack, intelligence; stupid; inane.

Rip stared in vacant stupidity.

Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 59.

7. In law: (a) Not filled; unoccupied: as, a vacant office. (b) Empty: as, a vacant house. In the law of fire-insurance a house may be unoccupied, and yet not be deemed vacant. (c) Abandoned; having no heir: as, vacant effects or goods.—Vacant cylinder, lot, possession. See the nouns.—Syn. 1-4. Vacant, Empty, Void, Devoid. Void and devoid are now used in a physical sense only in poetic or elevated diction; void is often used of laws, legal instruments, and the like: as, the will or deed or law was pronounced null and void. Devoid is now always followed by of: as, devoid of reason; a mind devoid of ideas. Vacant and empty are primarily physical: as, an empty box; a vacant lot. Empty is much the more general: it applies to that which contains nothing, whether previously filled or not: as, an empty bottle, drawer, nest, head. Vacant applies to that which has been filled or occupied, or is intended or is ready or needs to be filled or occupied: as, a vacant throne, chair, space, office, mind: an empty room has no furniture in it; a vacant room is one that is free for occupation. Vacant is a word of some dignity, and is therefore not used of the plainest things: we do not speak of a vacant box or bottle.

vacantly (vā'kant-li), adv. In a vacant manner; idly.

vacate (vā'kāt), v.; pret. and pp. vacated, ppr. vacating. [L. vacatus, pp. of vacare, be empty or vacant. From the same L. verb are ult. E. vacant, vacuous, vacuum, etc. Cf. vain.] I. trans. 1. To make vacant; cause to be empty;

quit the occupancy or possession of; leave empty or unoccupied: as, James II. vacated the throne.—2. To annul; make void; make of no authority or validity.

That after-Act, vacating the authority of the precedent.

Edison, Basidles, p. 10.

If a man insures his life, this killing himself vacates the bargain.

Walpole, Letters, II. 418.

3. To defeat the purpose of; make void of meaning; make useless.

He vacates my revenge. Dryden, Don Sebastian, ii. 1.

II. intrans. To quit; leave.

I to pay four dollars and twenty-five cents to-night, he to vacate at five to-morrow morning.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 48.

vacation (vā-kā'shon), n. [ME. vacacion, vacacionum, < OF. vacacion, vacation, F. vacation = Pr. vaccatio = Sp. vacacion = Pg. vacação = It. vacanza, < L. vacatio(n)-, leisure, < vacare, pp. vacatus, be empty, free, or unoccupied: see vacate.] 1. The act of vacating. Specifically—(a) The act of leaving without an occupant: as, the vacation of an office. (b) The act of making void, vacant, or of no validity: as, the vacation of a charter.

2. A space of time, or a condition, in which there is an intermission of a stated employment or procedure; a stated interval in a round of duties; a holiday.

To raise Recruits, and draw new Forces down,

Thus, in the dead Vacation of the Town.

Congreve, Pyrrhus, Prolog.

Specifically—(a) In law, temporary cessation of judicial proceedings; the space of time between the end of one term of court and the beginning of the next; the period during which a court holds no sessions; recess; non-term. In England the vacations are—Christmas vacation, commencing on December 24th and ending January 6th; Easter vacation, commencing on Good Friday and ending on Easter Tuesday; Whitsun vacation, commencing on the Saturday before and ending on the Tuesday after Whitsunday; and the long vacation, commencing on August 13th and ending on October 23d.

Why should not conscience have vacation

As well as other courts o' th' nation?

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 317.

(b) The intermission of the regular studies of an educational institution of any kind, when the students have a recess; holidays: as, the summer vacation.

3. The act of becoming vacant; avoidance: said especially of a see or other spiritual dignity.—4. Freedom from duty; leisure time.

From oother worldly occupacioun.

Chaucer, Prolog, To Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 683.

vacationist (vā-kā'shon-ist), n. [Vacation + -ist.] One who is taking a vacation; especially, one who is journeying for pleasure; an excursionist. [Colloq.]

vacationless (vā-kā'shon-less), a. [Vacation + -less.] Without a vacation; deprived of a vacation.

vacatur (vā-kā'tér), n. [ML. vacatur, 3d pers. pres. ind. pass. of vacare, make void, trans. use of L. vacare, be empty or void: see vacate.] In law, the act of annulling or setting aside.

vaccary (vak'a-ri), n.; pl. vaccaries (-riz). [ML. vaccaria, < L. vacca, a cow: see vaccine. Cf. vachery, a doublet of vaccary.] A cow-house, dairy, or cow-pasture. See vachery. [Prov. Eng.]

At this time there were eleven vaccaries (places of pasture for cows) in Pendle Forest, and the herbage and agistments of each vaccary were valued to the lord at 10s., or in all 110s. yearly.

Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II. 25.

vaccigenous (vak-sij'e-nus), a. [Irreg. < vaccine + L. -gerere, carry.] Producing vaccine: applied to methods of cultivating vaccine virus, or to farms and institutions where the virus is produced in quantity.

vaccin (vak'sin), n. Same as vaccine.

vaccina (vak-si'nā), n. [NL., < L. vaccinus, of or from cows: see vaccine.] Same as vaccinia. [Doughfison.]

vaccinal (vak'si-nal), a. [Vaccine + -al.] Of or relating to vaccine; caused by vaccination. Med. News, LII. 546.—Vaccinal erythema, vaccine-point (vak-sin'point), n. A thin piece of skin, usually, of a small, sharpened at one end, and used with dried vaccine lymph. The point is made by detaching the skin with the point of a lancet, the use of a lancet.

Vaccinia (vak-sin-i-ā), n. [NL. < L. vaccinus, of pertaining to a cow; see vaccine.] A specific eruptive disease occurring in cattle, especially in milk cows. It is characterized by an eruption of small papules, then changing to vesicular, situated usually at the junction of the teats with the udder. The vesicles are umbilicated, the margin being more elevated than the center, and contains a clear yellowish fluid. The skin surrounding it is somewhat inflamed, reddish in color, and indurated. The vesicle increases in size up to about the tenth day, when the contents become more opaque, and a crust begins to form. This crust increases in size for a few days, and then dries up and falls off at about the end of the third week. During the height of the disease there may be a little fever and loss of appetite, and the yield of milk may be somewhat diminished; but in general the constitutional disturbance is slight. It is by inoculation with lymph taken from the vesicles in this disease as it occurs in the cow or in the human subject that immunity against smallpox is conferred upon man. See vaccinia and vaccine. Also vaccinia and cowpox.

Vacciniaceæ (vak-sin-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1845). < Vaccinium + -aceæ.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the cohort Ericales. It is distinguished from the related order Ericaceæ by the fact that the inferior ovary forms a fleshy fruit. It includes about 348 species, belonging to 27 genera (classed in two tribes, the Thibaudieæ and Euvaccinieæ, natives of moist mountain woods in temperate and cold regions, also numerous in tropical Asia and America, with 3 genera in islands of the Pacific. They are erect or prostrate shrubs or trees, often epiphytes, sometimes with tuberous or thickened stems, and frequently climbing over trees. The leaves are alternate or scattered, generally evergreen, and the flowers are usually in bracted racemes. Four genera occur in the United States, of which Vaccinium (the type), Gaylussacia, and Oxycoccus are the most important, producing the blueberries, huckleberries, and cranberries of the market; the other genus, Chiogenes, the snowberry, is transitional to the Ericaceæ, or heath family. See cuts under cranberry, huckleberry, and Vaccinium.

vaccinic (vak-sin'ik), a. [vaccine + -ic.] Of or pertaining to vaccine.

Vaccinieæ (vak-sin-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1813). < Vaccinium + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the order Vacciniaceæ, also known as Euvaccinieæ. The flowers are usually small, their substance delicate, and the filaments distinct. It includes 9 or 10 genera, of which Vaccinium is the type.

vaccinifer (vak-sin'i-fēr), n. [vaccine, + L. ferre = E. bear.] 1. The source, either a person or an animal, of the vaccine virus. — 2. An instrument used in vaccination. Quincy, Med. Diet., p. 1724.

vacciniola (vak-sin-i-ō-lī), n. [NL. dim. of vaccinia, q. v.] A secondary eruption, resembling that at the site of inoculation, sometimes seen after vaccination.

vaccinist (vak'si-nist), n. [vaccine + -ist.] 1. One who performs vaccination. — 2. One who favors the practice of vaccination.

Vaccinium (vak-sin'i-um), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737). < L. vaccinium, blueberry, whortleberry.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, type of the order Vacciniaceæ and of the tribe Euvaccinieæ, the blueberries. It is distinguished from Gaylussacia, the huckleberry genus, by the numerous ovules in each cell of the ovary and by sometimes having only eight stamens.

1. Vaccinium corymbosum (common blueberry). 2. Branch with fruit. 3. A flower.

and from Oxycoccus, the cranberry genus, by usually having the anthers awned on the back. (See cut 7 under stamen.) It includes about 110 species, inhabiting the temperate and frigid regions of the northern hemisphere and the mountains of the tropics. They are usually branching shrubs, rarely trees, a few epiphytic. The leaves are generally small, coriaceous, and evergreen, but sometimes membranaceous and deciduous; the flowers small, white, pink, or red, disposed in axillary or terminal racemes or axillary fascicles, rarely solitary, usually with bracts. Many of the species yield edible berries. (See whortleberry and blueberry, and compare huckleberry, cranberry, hurtle, and hurtleberry.) The 3 well-known circum-polar species, V. Myrtillus, V. uliginosum, and V. Vitis-Idæa, are the only species in Europe, the most important being V. Myrtillus, the whortleberry. V. uliginosum, the blueberry or bog-bilberry, a smaller shrub with terete branches and usually four-parted flowers, is common in northern Britain and in Canada. V. Vitis-Idæa, the cowberry or mountain-cranberry, with evergreen leaves and prostrate stems, yields an acid red berry, edible when cooked, and sometimes substituted for the cranberry; it ranges in America from New England to Point Barrow, 71° 19' north. There are 10 or more species in Alaska, and 22 in the United States proper, classed in 4 distinct groups, of which the smaller are Vitis-Idæa, with ovate or globular corolla, and Batodendron, with open bell-shaped flowers, and berries little edible. (See farkleberry and squaw-huckleberry.) The blueberries, common species of the eastern United States and northward, forming the subgenus Cyanococcus, are replaced in the Rocky Mountains and Pacific States by the bilberries, species of Vaccinium proper, the typical section, which are themselves few and rare westward, but range more extensively in Canada. About 12 species occur in the northwestern United States, 3 of these and 10 others in the Southern States, 4 in the Rocky Mountain region, and 6 or more in Oregon or Nevada. Most species are low bushes; but V. arborescens, the farkleberry, sometimes reaches 25 feet in height, and V. corymbosum, the widely distributed blue huckleberry of the later summer market, is often 10 feet in height. The American cranberry, Oxycoccus macrocarpus, was formerly, and by some authors is still, referred to this genus.

vaccinization (vak-sin-i-zā'shon), n. [vaccine + -ize + -ation.] A very thorough method of vaccination, in which repeated inoculations are made until the vaccineal susceptibility is completely destroyed.

vaccinosyphilis (vak'si-nō-sif'i-lis), n. [vaccine + syphilis.] Syphilis transmitted by impure humanized vaccine or by infected instruments used in vaccination.

vachet, n. [ME., < OF. (and F.) vache = Sp. vaca = Pg. It. vacca, < L. vacca, a cow: see vaccine.] A cow; hence, a beast.

Therefore, thou vache, leve thyñ old wrecchednesse. Chaucer, Truth, l. 22.

vaccinella (vak-sin-el-lā), n. Spurious vaccineinia; a disease resembling vaccineinia, but which is not true vaccineal eruption.

ing one way and the other; a reeling or staggering.

They [the bones of the feet] are put in action by every slip or vacillation of the body. Paley, Nat. Theol., xi.

2. Vacillatory conduct; fluctuation of resolution; inconstancy; changeableness.

No remainders of doubt, no vacillation.

Bp. Hall, Peace-Maker, ii. § 4.

By your variety and vacillation you lost the acceptable time of the first grace.

Bacon, Charge in Star Chamber against W. Talbot.

vacillatory (vak'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< vacillate + -ory.] Inclined to vacillate; wavering; vacillating; uncertain; irresolute. [Rare.]

Such vacillatory accounts of affairs of state.

Roger North, Examen, p. 25.

vacua (vak'ū-ā), n. [Native name.] A general name in Mauritius for the screw-pines (Pandanus), which there abound in numerous species, forming trees 20 or 30 feet high or more. P. utilis, introduced from Madagascar, growing, if permitted, 30 feet or more high, is commonly planted for its leaves, which are fabricated into sugar-sacks or vacua bags. See cut under Pandanus.

vacua, n. An occasional plural of vacuum.

vacuate (vak'ū-at), v. t. & i. pret. and pp. vacuated, ppr. vacuating. [< L. vacuatus, pp. of vacuare, make empty or void, < vacuus, empty: see vacuus.] To make empty or void; evacuate. [Rare.]

Mistaken zeal, . . . like the Pharisee's Corban, under the pretense of an extraordinary service to God, vacuates all duty to man.

Secular Priest Exposed (1703), p. 27. (Latham.)

vacuation (vak'ū-ā-shōn), n. [< vacuate + -ion.] The act of emptying; evacuation. Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

vacuist (vak'ū-ist), n. [< vacuum + -ist.] One who holds the doctrine of the reality of empty spaces in nature: opposed to plenist.

And the vacuists will have this advantage, that if Mr. Hobbes shall say that it is as lawful for him to assume a plenum as for others to assume a vacuum, not only it may be answered it is also as lawful for them to assume the contrary, and he but barely assuming, not proving, a plenum, his doctrine will still remain questionable.

Boyle, Examen of Hobbes, ii.

vacuity (vā-kū'ī-ti), n.; pl. vacuities (-tiz). [< OF. (and F.) vacuité = Pr. vacuitat = Sp. vacuidad = Pg. vacuidade = It. vacuità, < L. vacuita(t)-s, emptiness, < vacuus, empty: see vacuus.] 1. The state of being vacuous, empty, or unfilled; emptiness; vacancy; the state of being devoid or destitute of anything.

Men . . . are at first without understanding or knowledge at all. Nevertheless from this vacuity they grow by degrees till they come at length to be even as the angels themselves are.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 6.

Leave weak eyes to grow sand-blind,

Content with darkness and vacuity.

Browning, Development.

2. Space unfilled or unoccupied, or apparently unoccupied; a vacant space; also, a vacuum.

The sides of the vacuity are set with columns.

Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 18, 1645.

The world, so far as it is a negation, is a negation of infinite vacuity in time and space.

Veitch, Introd. to Descartes's Method, p. clxii.

But yesterday I saw a dreary vacuity in this direction in which now I see so much.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 278.

3. Want of reality; inanity; nihility.

If they'll run behind the glass to catch at it, their expectations will meet with vacuity and emptiness. Glanville.

4. Freedom from mental exertion; thoughtlessness; listlessness; idleness.

A patient people, much given to slumber and vacuity, and but little troubled with the disease of thinking.

Iving, Knickerbocker, ii. 1.

5. Lack of intelligence; stupidity.

He was confounded, and continued looking with that perplexed vacuity of eye which puzzled souls generally stare with.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 1.

Vacuna (vā-kū'nā), n. [< L. vacuina, < vacare, be at leisure: see vacant, vacate.] In Latin myth., the goddess of rural leisure, to whom husbandmen sacrificed at the close of harvest. She was especially a deity of the Sabines.

vacuolar (vak'ū-ō-lār), a. [< vacuole + -ar.] Of the nature of or pertaining to a vacuole; resembling a vacuole: as, vacuolar spaces. See cut under hydranth. Amer. Nat., October, 1890, p. 895.

vacuolate (vak'ū-ō-lāt), a. [< vacuole + -ate.] Same as vacuolated. Microsc. Sci., XXX. 6.

vacuolated (vak'ū-ō-lā-ted), a. [< vacuolate + -ed.] Provided with vacuoles; minutely vesicular, as a protozoan.

vacuolation (vak'ū-ō-lā'shōn), n. [< vacuolate + -ion.] The formation of vacuoles; the state of being vacuolated; a system of vacuoles. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 848.

vacuole (vak'ū-ōl), n. [*< F. vacuole, < NL. *vacuolum*, dim. of L. vacuum, an empty space, vacuum: see vacuum.] 1. A minute cell or cavity in the tissue of organisms.—2. In anat., a minute space, vacuity, or interstice of tissue in which lymphatic vessels are supposed to originate.—3. In zool., any minute vesicle or vacuity in the tissue of a protozoan, as an amoeba. Vacuoles are sometimes divided into permanent, contractile or pulsating, and gastric. The first are sometimes so numerous as to give the organism a vesicular or bubble-like appearance. The second kind exhibit regular contraction and dilatation, or pulsate. Gastric vacuoles, or food-vacuoles, occur in connection with the ingestion and digestion of food; these are formed by a globule of water which has been taken in with a particle of food, and are not permanent. See cuts under Actinospherium, Noctiluca, Paramecium, sun-animalcule, and Cestoida.

4. In bot., a cavity of greater or less size within the protoplasmic mass of active vegetable cells, which is filled with water, or cell-sap as it is called. Active protoplasm possesses the power of imbibing water into its substance and, as a consequence, of increasing in size. When the amount of water is so great that the protoplasm may be said to be more than saturated with it, the excess is separated within the protoplasmic mass in the form of rounded drops called vacuoles. In closed cells these may become so large and abundant as to be separated only by thin plates of protoplasm. As such vacuoles become larger the plates are broken through, and eventually there may be but one large vacuole surrounded by a thin layer of protoplasm, which lines the interior of the cell-wall. Bessey.

vacuolization (vak'ū-ōl-i-zā'shōn), n. [< vacuole + -ize + -ation.] In histology, same as vacuolation. Amer. Jour. Psychol., II. 634.

vacuolize (vak'ū-ō-liz), v. t. pret. and pp. vacuolized, ppr. vacuolizing. To supply or furnish with vacuoles. Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 533. [Rare.]

vacuous (vak'ū-us), a. [= It. vacuo (cf. Sp. vacuo = Pg. vacuo, < L. vacuus), < L. vacuus, empty.] 1. Empty; unfilled; void; vacant.

Boundless the deep, because I Am, who fill Infinity; nor vacuous the space.

Milton, P. L., vii. 169.

These pulpits were filled, or rather made vacuous, by men whose privileged education in the ancient centres of instruction issued in twenty minutes' formal reading of tepid exhortation or probably infirm deductions from premises based on rotten scaffolding.

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xv.

2. Without intelligence or intelligent expression; unexpressive; showing no intelligence: as, a vacuous look.

Up the marble stairs came the most noble Farintosh, with that vacuous leer which distinguishes his lordship.

vacuousness (vak'ū-us-nes), n. The state of being vacuous, in either sense; vacuity.

vacuum (vak'ū-um), n.; pl. vacuums (-umz), sometimes vacua (-ā). [= F. vacuum = Sp. Pg. It. vacuo, < L. vacuum, an empty space, a void, neut. of vacuus, empty: see vacuus.] Empty space; space void of matter: opposed to plenum; in practical use, an inclosed space from which the air (or other gas) has been very nearly removed, as by an air-pump. The metaphysicians of Elea, Parmenides and Melissus, started the notion that a vacuum was impossible, and this became a favorite doctrine with Aristotle. All the scholastics upheld the maxim that "nature abhors a vacuum." This is the doctrine of the plenists. Atomism, on the other hand, carried out in a thoroughgoing manner, supposes empty space between the atoms. That gases do not fill space homogeneously is now demonstrated by the phenomena of transfusion and by the impulsion of Crookes's radiometer; while the other observed facts about gases, taken in connection with these, render some form of the kinetical theory of gases almost certain. This supposes the molecules of gases to be at great distances from one another as compared with their spheres of sensible action. This, however, does not exclude, but rather favors, Bosovich's theory of atoms—namely, that atoms are mere movable centers of potential energy endowed with inertia; and this theory makes each atom extend throughout all space in a certain sense. But this does not constitute a plenum, for a plenum is the exclusive occupation of each part of space by a portion of matter. It may be said that the spaces between the atoms are filled by the luminiferous ether, which seems to be the substance of electricity; but the dispersion of light by refraction seems to show that the ether itself has a molecular structure. A vacuum, in the sense of a space devoid of ordinary ponderable matter, is produced (more or less perfectly) when the air is removed from an inclosed space, such as the receiver of an air-pump, a part of a barometric tube, etc. In the receiver of the ordinary air-pump the vacuum can only be partial, since with each stroke of the piston only a certain fraction of the air is removed (depending upon the relative size of the cylinder and the receiver), and hence, theoretically, an infinite number of strokes would be necessary. Practically, the degree of exhaustion obtained falls short of that demanded by theory, owing to the imperfections of the machine; thus, in the common form, the exhaustion is limited to the point where the remaining air has not sufficient elasticity to raise the valves. By the Sprengel or mercury air-pump a much more perfect degree of exhaustion is attainable than with the mechanical form. (See mercury air-pump, under mercury.) The most perfect vacuum is obtained when chemical means are employed to absorb the last traces of gas left in the receiver exhausted by the mercury air-pump. The Torricellian vacuum—that is, the space above the mercury in a carefully manipulated barometer-tube—is more nearly perfect in this respect, but the space contains a small amount of the vapor of mercury. See Torricellian.

Vacuum . . . signifies space without body.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xiii. 22.

A vacuum, or space in which there is absolutely no body, is repugnant to reason.

Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), ii. § 16.

Guerickian vacuum. See Guerickian.

vacuum-brake (vak'ū-um-brāk), n. A form of continuous brake used on railroads, employing a steam-jet directly, and the pressure of the atmosphere indirectly, as a means of controlling the pressure. A steam-jet on the engine is allowed to escape through an ejector, in such a way as to create a partial vacuum in a continuous pipe extending under all the cars of a train. Collapsing bellows under each car are connected with the pipes, and, when exhausted of the air contained in them, close and draw the brake-rods. Two forms are used, the Smith brake and the Eames brake. See continuous brake, under brakes.

vacuum-filter (vak'ū-um-fil'tēr), n. A form of filter in which the air beneath the filtering material is exhausted to hasten the process.

vacuum-gage (vak'ū-um-gāj), n. A form of pressure-gage for indicating the internal pressure or the amount of vacuum in a steam-condenser, a boiler in which the steam has condensed, the receiver of an air-pump, etc. A common form consists of an inverted graduated siphon of glass, open at one end, and connected at the other with the condenser or vessel to be tested, and containing a quantity of mercury. When not in use, the mercury rises equally in both legs of the siphon; on connecting the instrument with a vacuum, the mercury rises in the leg next the condenser or other vessel, and sinks in the other leg, the difference between them indicating the amount of the vacuum. This form is also called barometer-gage. E. H. Knight.

vacuum-pan (vak'ū-um-pan), n. In the processes of sugar-making, condensed-milk manufacture, etc., a large steam-jacketed vessel of copper or iron, used in boiling and concentrating syrup, milk, etc. Two forms are used, one consisting of two parts bolted together to form a spheroidal vessel, and the other of a drum shape with a domed top. The syrup or milk is placed in the pan, the vessel is closed air-tight, and connections are made by means of pipes with a condenser and air-pump. Steam is admitted to the jacket round the lower part of the pan, and to coils of pipes within it. The air-pump serves to draw off the Vacuum gage.

Vacuum-pan.

a, copper pan; b, iron steam jacket; c, copper steam-coil; d, flanged dome; e, measuring vessel used in charging the pan; f, pipe which connects e with the int. ext. g, pipe which connects e with the pan; h, cock which admits air into e; i, h, gauges which indicate height of liquid in e and i; j, mercurial vacuum-gage; k, man-hole by which pan may be entered; l, thermometer, showing interior temperature of the pan; m, jet-stick for sampling the contents of the pan; n, valve for admitting steam to the coil; o, valve for admitting steam to interior of pan for cleaning; p, window (of which there are two) by which interior of pan may be inspected; q, saucer-shaped valve, closing or opening the outlet g according as it is operated by the lever r; s, overflow vessel, to retain any fluid that may be boiled over.

vapor from the boiling contents, and to create a vacuum within the pan. The advantages of this boiling in a vacuum are found in the lower temperature at which boiling takes place, and, as a result, in the greater rapidity of the process and purity of the product. Vacuum-pans are sometimes placed in pairs, the steam from one pan serving to heat the fluid in the second pan. Such an arrangement is called a double-effect system. Occasionally three pans are used together, one large pan supplying steam for two smaller pans. This is called a triple-effect system. See sugar.

as birds, the termination of the oviduct, beyond the uterine part, receives the name of vagina. See uterus, and cut under peridomum. (b) In entom., a sheath like plate or part inclosing an organ. In some cases also called valve. See specifically—(1) The long channelled labrum of the mosquito and other blood-sucking flies, in which the lancet-like mandibles and maxillæ are concealed. (2) The jointed sheath of the pronotus of hemipterous insects, homologous with the labium of a typical insect. (3) The parts supporting and covering the tongue of a bee, corresponding to the mentum, maxillæ, and palpi. (4) The tubular sheath of the sting of a bee or wasp. (c) In Protozoa, the indurated lorica of some infusorians, as the vaginicolous vorticellids. (d) In Vermes, a terminal section of the oviduct, differentiated into a special canal. See cuts under Rhabdocera, Trematoda, and Cestodea.

3. In arch., the upper part of the pedestal of a terminus, from which the bust or figure seems to issue or arise; a sheath or gaine. [Rare or obsolete.] — Columns of the vagina. Same as columns caputrum (which see, under columna). — Rugæ of the vagina. See rugæ. — Tensor laminae posterioris vaginae recti abdominis. See tensor. — Tensor vaginae femoris. See tensor. — Vagina cellulosa. Same as epinurium and perinurium. — Vagina femoris, the fascia lata of the thigh. — See fascia and tensor. — Vagina masculina, the prostatic vesicle of the male urethra. — See urethra. — Also called sinus pederis, uterus masculinus, etc. — Vagina portæ, the sheath of the portal vein, or capsule of Glisson, a sort of membrane surrounding the branches of the portal vein in the liver. — Vagina tendinis, the synovial sheath of a tendon; a vaginal synovial membrane (which see, under synovial). — Vestibulum vaginae. Same as vestibule, 2 (b).

vaginal (vaj'i-nal), a. [< NL. vaginalis, < L. vagina, a sheath; see vagina.] 1. Pertaining to a sheath; sheathing; resembling a sheath: as, a vaginal membrane. — 2. Specifically, of or pertaining to the vagina of the female: as, vaginal mucous membrane; a vaginal syringe. — Vaginal arteries. (a) A branch of the internal iliac artery, on either side, passing to the vagina and base of the bladder, corresponding to the inferior vesical artery in the male. (b) The branches of the hepatic artery which supply the walls of the ducts and blood-vessels and Glisson's capsule in the liver, more commonly called the vaginal branches of the hepatic artery. — Vaginal hernia, a hernia through the posterior or upper wall of the vagina. — Vaginal plexus. (a) The nerves supplied to the vagina, coming from the pelvic plexus. (b) Radicles of the portal vein in the capsule of Glisson. (c) A venous anastomosis in the wall of the vagina. — Vaginal process. See process, and cut 3 under temporal. — Vaginal synovial membrane. See synovial. — Vaginal tunic. (a) See eye, 1. (b) The tunica vaginalis testis. See tunica. — Vaginal veins. Same as vaginal plexus, (b) and (c).

Vaginalis (vaj-i-nā'lis), n. [NL. (Gmelin, 1788), < L. vagina, a sheath; see vagina.] Same as Chimies. See cut under sheath.

vaginalitis (vaj-i-nā'li-tis), n. [NL., < vaginalis (see def.) + -itis.] Inflammation of the tunica vaginalis testis.

vaginant (vaj'i-nant), a. [*< NL. *vaginant(t)-s*, ppr. of **vaginare*, sheath: see vaginate, v.] Sheathing; vaginal: as, a vaginant leaf (a leaf investing the stem by a tubular base).

Vaginata (vaj-i-nā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of vaginatus, sheathed; see vaginate.] A group of actinozoans, comprising those which are sheathed in a calcareous or corneous polypary; the sheathed polyps, as the sclerodermic and sclerobasic corals. See Zoantharia.

vaginate (vaj'i-nāt), a. and n. [< NL. vaginatus, sheathed, < L. vagina, a sheath; see vagina.] 1. a. 1. Sheathed; invaginated; furnished with or contained in a vagina; invaginated. — 2. Forming or formed into a sheath; vaginal, as a leaf.

II. n. A vaginate or sheathed polyp.

vaginate (vaj'i-nāt), v. t., pret. and pp. vaginatus, ppr. vaginating. [*< NL. *vaginatus*, ppr. of **vaginare*, sheath, < L. vagina, a sheath; see vagina.] To sheathe; invaginate.

vaginervose (vaj-i-nēr'vōs), a. [< L. vagus, wandering, + nervus, nerve.] In bot., irregularly nerved; having the nerves placed with no apparent order.

Vaginicola (vaj-i-nik'ō-lā), n. [NL., < L. vagina, a sheath, + colere, inhabit.] The typical genus of Vaginicolineae, having an erect sessile lorica without an inner valve. The genus was instituted by Lamarck, and contains many species, chiefly of fresh water, as V. crystallina.

Vaginicolineae (vaj-i-nik'ō-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vaginicola + -inae.] A subfamily of Forticellidae, containing those vorticellid peritrichous infusorians which are sheathed in an erect or procumbent indurated lorica which they secrete. There are numerous modern genera, as Vaginicola, Thuricula, Cothurnia, Paricula, Pachytricha, Stylacola, Platycula, and Lagenophrys. Also Vaginicolineae.

vaginicoline (vaj-i-nik'ō-līn), a. [As Vaginicola + -ine.] Living in a vagina, sheath, or lorica, as an animalcule; belonging to the Vaginicolineae; vaginiferous.

vaginiculous (vaj-i-nik'ō-lus), a. [As Vaginicola + -ous.] Same as vaginicoline.

Vaginifera (vaj-i-nif'er-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of vaginifer: see vaginiferous.] In Perty's system (1852), a family of spastic infusorians, represented by the genera Vaginicola and Cothurnia; corresponding to the Vaginicolineae.

vaginiferous (vaj-i-nif'er-us), a. [< NL. vaginifer, < L. vagina, a sheath, + ferre = E. bear.] Producing or bearing a vagina, as an infusorian; of or pertaining to the Vaginifera; vaginicoline.

vaginigluteus, vaginigluteus (vaj'i-ni-glō-tē'us), n.; pl. vaginiglutei, vaginiglutei (-i). [NL.,

< vagina + glutens, glutens, q. v.] Same as tensor vaginae femoris (which see, under tensor). Cones, 1887.

vaginigluteal (vaj-i-ni-glō-tē'al), a. [< vaginigluteus + -al.] Of or pertaining to the vaginigluteus. Cones, 1887.

vaginipennate (vaj'i-ni-pen'āt), a. [< L. vagina, a sheath, + pennatus, winged; see pennate.] Sheath-winged or sharded, as a beetle; coleopterous. Also vaginopennatus.

vaginismus (vaj-i-nis'mus), n. [NL., < vagina + -ismus = E. -ism.] A spasmodic narrowing of the orifice of the vagina. Also called vulvismus.

vaginitis (vaj-i-ni'tis), n. [NL., < vagina + -itis.] Inflammation of the vagina.

vaginodynia (vaj'i-nō-din'i-ā), n. [NL., < L. vagina, vagina, + Gr. ὄδυν, pain.] Neuralgia of the vagina.

vaginopennous (vaj-i-nō-pen'us), a. [< L. vagina, a sheath, + penna, a feather, + -ous.] Same as vaginipennate.

vaginotomy (vaj-i-not'ō-mi), n. [< L. vagina, vagina, + Gr. -τομή, < τέμνω, τμήν, cut.] Cutting of the vagina.

vaginovesical (vaj-i-nō-ves'i-kal), a. [< L. vagina, vagina, + vesica, bladder.] Same as vesicovaginal.

vaginula (vā-jin'ū-lā), n.; pl. vaginulae (-lē). [NL., dim. of L. vagina, a sheath; see vagina.]

1. In bot., a diminutive vagina or sheath; specifically, in mosses, the sheath round the base of the seta where it springs from the stem. Also vaginule. — 2. In zool., a little sheath; a small vagina.

vaginulate (vā-jin'ū-lāt), a. [< vaginula + -ate.] Having a vaginula; sheathed.

vaginule (vaj'i-nūl), n. [< NL. vaginula.] In bot., same as vaginula.

vagissatet, v. i. To caper; frolic. Campbell, (Worcester).

vagitus (vā-jī'tus), n. [L., < vagire, cry, squall.] The cry of a new-born child.

vagus (vā'gus), a. [< L. vagus, wandering, strolling; see vague.] 1. t. Wandering; unsettled. Ayliffe. — 2. In anat., wandering, as a nerve. See vagus. [Rare.]

vagrance, n. Same as vagrancy. Johnson.

vagrancy (vā'gran-si), n. [< vagrant(t) + -cy.]

1. A state of wandering without a settled home: not necessarily in a bad sense.

Therefore did he spend his days in continual labour, in restless travel, in endless vagrancy, going about doing good. Barrow, Sermons, xxxvi.

2. The life and condition of a vagrant; in law, the name given to a very miscellaneous class of offenses against public police and order. See vagrant.

vagrant (vā'grant), a. and n. [Formerly sometimes vagarant (appar. simulating vagary), < ME. vagant, < OF. vagant, wandering; see vagant. The r is intrusive, as in partridge, cartridge, and other words. There is nothing in vagrant to lead to a variation vagrant; but the fact that there are no other E. words ending in -agant, and that there are several familiar words ending in -agrant, as fragrant, flagrant, with many words in -grant, may have caused the change.] 1. a. 1. Wandering from place to place; roving, with uncertain direction or destination; moving or going hither and thither; having no certain course.

Vagrant through all the world, hopeless of all, He seeks with what lands ruin he may fall. May, tr. of Lucan's Pharsalia, viii.

His house was known to all the vagrant train; He hid their wand'rings, but relieved their pain. Goldsmith, Des. Vil. l. 149.

The soft murmur of the vagrant Bee. Wordsworth, Vernal Ode, iv.

2. Uncertain; erratic.

The offspring of a vagrant and ignoble love. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., v.

3. Of or pertaining to one who wanders; unsettled; vagabond.

Titus Oates . . . had ever since led an infamous and vagrant life. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., ii.

Well pleased to pitch a vagrant tent among The unfenced regions of society. Wordsworth, Prelude, vii.

4. In med., wandering: as, vagrant cells (wandering white corpuscles of the blood).

II. n. 1. A wanderer; a rover; a rambler.

Historie without Geographic mouth, but in mousing wand'reth as a vagrant, without certain habitation. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 50.

A vagrant and a servant in vile employment, in a strange country. Barrow, Sermons, xlvii.

2. An idle stroller; a vagabond; a loafer; a tramp: now the ordinary meaning.

Vagrants and Out-laws shall offend thy View; For such must be my Friends. Prior, Henry and Emma.

The fugitive, with the brand of Cain on him, was a vagrant of necessity, hunted to death like a wolf. Ridgdon-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 5.

In law the word vagrant has a much more extended meaning than that assigned to it in ordinary language, and in its application the notion of wandering is almost lost, the object of the statutes being to subject to police control various ill-defined classes of persons whose habits of life are inconsistent with the good order of society.

In the English statutes vagrants are divided into three grades: (a) idle and disorderly persons, or such as, while able to maintain themselves and families, neglect to do so, unlicensed peddlers or chapmen, beggars, common prostitutes, etc.; (b) rogues and vagabonds, notoriously idle and disorderly persons, fortune-tellers and other like impostors, public gamblers and sharpers, persons having no visible means of living and unable to give a good account of themselves, etc.; (c) incorrigible rogues—that is, such as have been repeatedly convicted as rogues and vagabonds, jail-breakers, and persons escaping from legal duance, etc. In the United States the statutes are diverse, but in their general features include to a greater or less extent beggars, drunken parents who refuse or fail to support their children, paupers when dissolute and sick, prostitutes, public masqueraders, tramps, truants, etc.

vagrantly (vā'grant-lī), adv. [< vagrant + -ly.]

In a vagrant, wandering, or unsettled manner.

vagrantness (vā'grant-nēs), n. The state of being vagrant; vagrancy. [Rare.]

vagromt (vā'grom), a. A perverted spelling and pronunciation of vagrant, ascribed as a blunder to Dogberry in "Much Ado about Nothing," and with allusion to this occasionally used by modern writers.

This is your charge: you shall comprehend all vagrom men; you are to bid any man stand, in the prince's name. Shak., Much Ado, iii. 3. 26.

You took my vagrom essays in; You found them shelter over sea. New Princeton Rev., VI. 114.

vague (vāg), a. and n. [< F. vague = Sp. Pg. It. vago, < L. vagus, wandering, rambling, strolling, fig. uncertain, vague. From the same L. source are E. vague, v., vagabond, vagant, vagrant, vagary, extravagant, extravagate, strava-gant, stravaig, etc., also Sc. vaig.] 1. a. 1. t. Wandering; roving; vagrant.

Gray encouraged his men to set upon the vague villains, good-neither to live peaceably nor to fight. Sir J. Hayward.

2. Uncertain as to characters and specific designation, yet limited in scope and application; restricted in logical breadth, without any corresponding fullness of logical depth; said to be determinate, but without precise expression of the determination. Thus, if anything is described as most extraordinary without saying in what respect, the description is vague; if a word is understood to have a full import but what that is is doubtful, it is vague; if an emotion is strong but unaccompanied by a definite imagination of its object, it is vague; if a pictorial figure represents that something exists but fails to show its shape, situation, etc., it is vague. This meaning of the word (which occurs seldom before the eighteenth century without an explanatory accompaniment) seems to be derived from the logical phrase individuum vagum, meaning a single person or thing, designated as one in number, but without its proper name or any adequate description: as, "a certain man."

A vague apprehension of I knew not what occupied my mind. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 193.

"Conscience!" said the Chancellor; "conscience is a vague word, which signifies any thing or nothing." Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

3. Proceeding from no known authority; of uncertain origin or derivation: as, a vague report.

I have read, in some old, marvellous tale, Some legend strange and vague, That a midnight host of spectres pale Beleaguered the walls of Prague. Longfellow, The Beleaguered City.

4. Having unclear perception or thought; not thinking clearly.

Random cares and truant joys, That shield from mischief and preserve from stains Vague minds, while men are growing out of boys. Wordsworth, River Duddon, xxvi.

Vague individual, sense, term. See the nouns. = Syn. 2. Dim, obscure, indistinct, ambiguous.

II. n. 1. A wandering; a journey; a voyage. Halliwel. — 2. t. A vagary; a whim.

Here this filthy synke of rebels, thus conspired, played their vages, and lured with loose brydels in al kyndes of myscheffe. Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 86).

3. An undefined expanse; indefinite space.

The star-sown vague of space. Lowell, After the Burial.

vague (vāg), v. i. [Sc. also vaig; < F. vaguer, wander, = Sp. Pg. vagar, vaguear = It. vagare, < L. vagari, wander, < vagus, wandering; see vague, a. Cf. vagary, v.] To wander; rove; roam; play the vagrant.

vail vāil, vāil. Also vail; by aphoresis from vail vāil. I. vāil. To let or cast down; lower; doff, especially in token of grief.

... think that Mars himself came down,
... and leave thee from thy pomp.
Greene, Orlando Furioso.

None that beheld him but . . .
... crowns to his supremacy.
Shak., Pericles, II. 3. 42.

Now vail your pride, you captive Christians,
And kneel for money to your conquering foe.
Marlowe, Jew of Malta, v. 2.

II. intrans. 1. To yield; give place; express respect or submission by yielding, uncovering, or otherwise; bow.

Because we vailed not to the Turkish fleet,
Their creeping galleys had us in the chase.
Marlowe, Jew of Malta, II. 2.

... that does not know cries, "What noblemen is that?" all the gallants on the stage rise, vail to me, kiss their hand, offer me their places.
Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, I. 3.

2. To drop; move down; take a lower position; slope downward.

The same ships in good order vailed down the River of France.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 288.

With all speed I vailed down that night ten miles, to take the tide in the morning.
Capt. Roger Bodenham (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 53).

vail vāil, n. [vail, v.] Submission; descent; decline.

Even with the vail and darkening of the sun,
To close the day up, Hector's life is done.
Shak., T. and C., v. 8. 7.

available (vā'la-bl), a. [By aphoresis from available.] Profitable; advantageous. Smith, Commonwealth, II. 4. (Richardson.)

vailer, vailing, etc. See veiler, etc.
vailer vā'ler, n. [vail + -er.] One who vails; one who yields or gives place in submission or deference.

He is high in his own imagination; . . . when hee goes, hee looks who looks; if hee finds not good store of vailers he comes home stifled.

Sir T. Overbury, Characters, A Golden Asse.

vaimure, n. Same as vaimure.

vain (vān), a. [ME. vain, vāyn, vein, veyn, < OF. (and F.) vain = Pr. vain, va = Cat. va = Sp. vano = Pg. vāo = It. vano, < L. vanus, empty, void, fig. idle, fruitless; of persons, idle, deceptive, ostentatious, vain; perhaps orig. **vacuus*, and so akin to L. vacuus, empty; see vacuous, vacant. Some suggest a connection with E. wane, want, wan; but this is improbable. Hence (from L. vanus) also E. vanish, vanity, vaunt, evanish, evanescence, etc.] 1. Having no real value or importance; worthless; unsubstantial; empty; trivial; idle.

But, O vain boast!

Who can control his fate?
Shak., Othello, v. 2. 264.

Vain matter is worse than rain words.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I.

She . . . had never proved

How vain a thing is mortal love
M. Arnold, Switzerland, vi, Isolation.

2. Producing no good result; destitute of force or efficacy; fruitless; ineffectual; useless; futile; unavailing.

It should be but a vaine thing, and counted but as lost labour.

Give us help from trouble; for vain is the help of man.

Let no man speak again
To alter this, for counsel is but vain.
Shak., Rich. II., III. 2. 214.

3. Light-minded; foolish; silly.

As school-maids change their names
By vain though apt affection.
Shak., M. for M., I. 4. 48.

For it is a vain thing to expect, in so open a condition as we live in here, that no cross winds should blow upon us.
Stillington, Sermons, I. x.

4. Proud of petty things or of trifling attainments or accomplishments; elated with a high opinion of one's personal appearance, manners, or the like; courting the admiration or applause of others; conceited; self-complacent; also, proceeding from or marked by such pride or conceit; as, to be vain of one's figure or one's dress.

For to be conscious of what all admire,
And not be vain, advances virtue higher.
Dryden, Eleonora, I. 101.

Mr. Holloway was a grave, conscientious clergyman, not vain of telling anecdotes, very learned, particularly a good orientalist. T. Warton, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 320.

I never heard or saw the introductory words "Without vanity I may say," etc., but some vain thing immediately followed.

valence (vāl'ens), n. and v. See valance.

valence (vāl'ens), n. [< LL. valentia, strength, < valen(t)-s, strong, ppr. of valere, be strong: see valiant, valid.] 1. In chem., the relative saturating or combining capacity of an atom compared with the standard hydrogen atom; the quality or force which determines the number of atoms with which any single atom will chemically unite. The original statement of the law of valence was that each atom could combine with a certain definite number of hydrogen atoms, or with an equivalent number of atoms of any other element, and that this number was fixed and unalterable. This number expressed the valence, which was a constant, an invariable property of the element. For example, one atom of phosphorus combines with three atoms of chlorine, forming phosphorus trichloride. As the chlorine atom is univalent, phosphorus appears to be trivalent. But in phosphorus pentachloride one atom of phosphorus combines with five of chlorine, and therefore phosphorus in this case appears quinquivalent. In view of facts like these it is held by some authorities that the valence of an element is a varying quality depending on the nature of the other combining atoms, temperature, etc. By others valence is assumed to be invariable, but the total valence is not always exhibited or in force. Also called valency, equivalence, and, less properly, atomicity.

2. In biol.: (a) Form value; morphological value or equivalency. See morphic. (b) In zool., taxonomic value or equivalency; classificatory grade or rank of a zoological group.

very high intrinsic value: hence the term "precious metals": a precious stone is also called a jewel, figuratively, a precious child is one very dear to his own sake. A costly stone is one that has been made expensive by carving, polishing, transportation from a great distance, or the like as the sarcophagus of Napoleon I.; in 1 Cor. iii. 12 the revised version corrects "precious stones" to "wooden stones." A valuable stone is one that can be made useful in some way, and therefore must not be thrown away. That which we value for its associations would be called more or less precious or dear, rather than valuable.

II. n. A thing, especially a small thing, of value; a choice article of personal property; any piece of precious merchandise, usually of small bulk: generally in the plural.

Inclining (with my usual cynicism) to think that he did steal the valuables.

Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, On a Medal of George the Fourth.

valuableness (val'ū-a-bl-nes), n. The character of being valuable; preciousness; worth.

valuation (val-u-a'shun), n. [= Sp. valuacion; as value + -ation.] 1. The act of valuing. Specifically—(a) The act of estimating the value or worth: the act of setting a price; appraisement; as, a valuation of lands for the purpose of taxation. (b) The act of duly valuing; estimation; appreciation; as, the just valuation of civil and religious privileges.

2. Value set upon a thing; estimated worth; value; worth.

The mines lie unlaboured, and of no valuation.
Bakley's Voyages, III. 466.

So slight a valuation.
Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 4. 49.

Home valuation, valuation or appraisement of imported merchandise according to the market prices at the port of import: in contradistinction to foreign valuation the method commonly in use by appraising according to the valuation of the foreign port or country of export. The principle of home valuation was introduced in the United States by the act of Congress of March 24, 1833, which provided for a gradual reduction of duties, to be followed in 1842 by the principle of home valuation according to regulations to be prescribed, which, however, were never introduced.

valuator (val'ū-a-tor), n. [value + -ator.] One who sets a value; an appraiser. Swift, Considerations upon Two Bills.

value (val'ū), n. [Early mod. E. also calow; < ME. valow, value, < OF. valu (= It. valuta), worth, value, < valere, fem. of valere, pp. of valere, < L. valere, be strong, be worth: see valiant, valor.] 1. Worth; the property or properties of a thing in virtue of which it is useful or estimable, or the degree in which such a character is possessed; utility; importance; excellence: applied to both persons and things.

Ye are all physicians of no value.
Job xiii. 4.

Ye are of more value than many sparrows. Mat. x. 31.

We had our Water measured out to us, 2 Pints a Man per day, till we came into our Channel. This was the first time that I began to know the value of fresh Water.

Dampier, Voyages, II. iii. 5.

To loyal hearts the value of all gifts
Must vary as the giver's.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

Always we are daunted by the appearances, not seeing that their whole value lies at bottom in the state of mind.
Emerson, War.

The only value of universal characters is that they help us, by reasoning, to know new truths about individual things.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 479.

2. Estimated or attributed worth; appreciation; valuation; esteem; regard.

Neither the pomp and grandeur of the World, nor the smiles and flatteries of it, nor its frowns and severities, could abate anything of that mighty esteem and value which he [Paul] had for the Christian Religion.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

I am not vain enough to boast that I have deserved the value of so illustrious a line.
Dryden, To the Duke of Ormond, Ded. of Fables.

Cesar is well acquainted with your virtues,
And therefore sets this value on your life.
Addison, Cato, II. 2.

I have a very great value for Mr. Bevil, but have absolutely put an End to his Pretensions.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, iii. 1.

3. The amount of other commodities (commonly represented by money) for which a thing can be exchanged in open market; the ratio in which one thing exchanges against others; the command which one commodity has over others in traffic; in a restricted (and the common popular) sense, the amount of money for which a thing can be sold; price. In political economy value is distinguished from price, which is worth estimated in money, while value is worth estimated in commodities in general.

So thei departed to pore knyghtes and squeres that neuer after were pore, in so moche that thei kepte not to hem-self the value of a peny. Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 167.

They [the Switzers] found there great spoyles that the Duke left behind, to the value of three Millions.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 12.

By the price of a thing, therefore, we shall henceforth understand its value in money; by the value, or exchange value of a thing, its general power of purchasing, the command which its possession gives over purchasable commodities in general. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. i. § 2.

The word value, so far as it can be correctly used, merely expresses the circumstance of its [a commodity's] exchanging in a certain ratio for some other substance.
Jevons, Pol. Econ., iv.

He could not manage finance; he knew values well, but he had no keenness of imagination for monetary results in the shape of profit and loss.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxiv.

The sense proper to value in economic discussion may, I think, be said to be universally agreed upon by economists, and I may, therefore, at once define it as expressing the ratio in which commodities in open market are exchanged against each other.
J. E. Cairnes, Pol. Econ., I. i. § 1.

4. Price equal to the intrinsic worth of a thing; real equivalent.

His design was not to pay him the value of his pictures, because they were above any price.
Dryden.

Worn gold coin received at its bullion value.
Rep. of Sec. of Treasury 1886, p. 329.

5. Import; precise signification; as, the value of a word or phrase.—6. In music, the relative length or duration of a tone signified by a note: as, a half-note has the value of two quarter-notes, or four sixteenth-notes; to give a note its full value.—7. In painting and the allied arts, relation of one object, part, or atmospheric plane of a picture to the others, with reference to light and shade, the idea of hue being abstracted. Thus, a picture in which the values are correct is one in which the distribution and interdependence of the light and dark parts correspond to nature, and particularly preserve the correct rendering of different distances from the observer; while a detail in a picture which is out of value is one which is too light or too dark in tone for the atmospheric plane which it should occupy, or for the proper rendering of its relations to other objects in the same plane.

It strikes us that the figure of the young preacher standing erect in the lofty pulpit has less value and atmospheric envelopment than it should possess in relation to the rest of the composition.
The Academy, No. 890, p. 365.

With all our knowledge of to-day, the values of this landscape could not be better expressed; the composition is most natural and original, and were it not for the lack of truth in the values of the figures, and for the intense piety of the sentiment, it might have been painted yesterday.
Scribner's Mag., IV. 717.

8. In math., the special determination of a quantity. Quantities in mathematics are identified by their general definitions, as satisfying certain conditions, and are variable, or otherwise indeterminate. A completely determinate quantity, or, more precisely, the quantity of a completely determinate quantum, is a value. Value is distinguished from magnitude in that the latter refers only to a modulus, or numerical measure, neglecting in some measure distinctions of kind, while two quantities which are not equal have not the same value, though they may have the same magnitude.

9. In biol., grade or rank in classification; valence: as, a group having the value of a family.—Annual value. See annual.—Form value, in biol., morphic valence; that grade of structural simplicity or complexity which any organism presents, or represents as compared with another: as, an ovum and an amoeba have alike the form value of the simple cell; any sea-urchin has the form value of echinoderms.—Good value, full value or worth in exchange, as, to get good value for one's money.—Local, market, minimum, multiple, par, principal value. See the qualifying words.—Surplus value. See the quotation.

The fundamental principle of the Marx school and of the whole cognate socialism is the theory of surplus value,—the doctrine, namely, that, after the labourer has been paid the wage necessary for the subsistence of himself and family, the surplus produce of his labour is appropriated by the capitalist who exploits it.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 211.

Surrender value. See surrender.—Terminal value. See terminal.—Value in exchange, exchange value, and exchangeable value, phrases often used to distinguish value in the economic sense (see def. 3) from its more general meaning of 'utility.'

The things which have the greatest value in use have frequently little or no value in exchange; and, on the contrary, those which have the greatest value in exchange have frequently little or no value in use.
Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, i. 4.

Value of money. See money.—Value received, a phrase used especially to indicate that a promissory note has been made, or a bill of exchange has been accepted, for a valuable consideration, and not by way of accommodation.—Syn. 1-4. Worth, Cost, etc. (see price), Income, Revenue, Profit, etc. See income.

value (val'ū), v. t.; pret. and pp. valued, ppr. valuing. [value, n.] 1. To estimate the value or worth of; specifically, to rate at a certain price; appraise: as, to value lands or goods.

This is the brief of money, plate, and jewels
I am possess'd of; 'tis exactly valued.
Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 138.

I thank God, the School of Affliction hath brought me to such a Habit of Patience, it has caused in me such Symptoms of Mortification, that I can value this World as it is.
Howell, Letters, iv. 39.

There was in London a renowned chain of pearls which was valued at ten thousand pounds.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. To consider with respect to value, worth, or importance; rate, whether high or low; regard.

The king must take it ill,
That he's so slightly valu'd in his messenger.
Shak., Lear, ii. 2. 153.

So little knows
Any, but God alone, to value right
The good before him. Milton, P. L., iv. 202.

After the initial investigation comes the criticism: first we have to identify, then we have to value, our historical inventory.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 76.

3. Specifically, to rate high; have in high esteem; set much by; prize; appreciate; regard; hold in respect or estimation; reflexively, to pride (one's self).

Value the judicious, and let not mere acquests in minor parts of learning gain thy pre-existimation.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., ii. 4.

These gentlemen . . . value themselves upon being critics in rust, and will undertake to tell you the different ages of it by its colour.
Addison, Ancient Medals, i.

I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist.
Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

A man valuing himself as the organ of this or that dogma is a dull companion enough.
Emerson, Clubs.

4. To reckon or estimate with respect to number or power; compute; compare (with another person or thing) with respect to price or excellence.

It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir.
Job xxviii. 16.

The queen is valued thirty thousand strong.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 3. 14.

5. To take account of; take into account; hence, to care for; consider as important.

If a man be in sickness or pain, the time will seem longer without a clock, . . . for the mind doth value every moment.
Bacon, Colours of Good and Evil, v.

I want 'em [maps], and I don't value the price, but I would have the most exact.
John Tipper, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 315.

6†. To raise to estimation; cause to have value, either real or apparent.

Some value themselves to their country by jealousies to the crown.
Sir W. Temple.

7†. To give out or represent as wealthy, or financially sound.

The scriveners and brokers do value unsound men to serve their own turn.
Bacon, Riches (ed. 1887).

8†. To be worth; be equal in worth to; be an equivalent of.

The peace between the French and us not values
The cost that did conclude it.
Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 1. 88.

Valued policy. See policy.—Syn. 3. Prize, Esteem, etc. See appreciate.

plate or sheath of any organ, generally one of a pair of plates which unite to form a tube or vagina, as those covering the external sexual organs, ovipositor, etc.—Accessory, aortic, back-pressure, basal valve. See the valvular words. Auriculoventricular valves, valves guarding either auriculoventricular orifice of the heart: on the right side the tricuspid, on the left the mitral. See cut under heart.—Bauhinian valve. Same as ileocecal.

Bicuspid valve. Same as mitral valve.—Blow-through, brake-shoe, conical valve. See blow-through.

Connivent valves. See valvula conniventes, under valvula.—Coronary valve. See coronary.—Cylindrical valve. See cylindrical.—Delivery valve. See delivery.—Eustachian valve. See Eustachian.—Gridiron valve. See gridiron.—Hasner's valve, an imperfect valve formed by the mucous membrane at the meatal end of the nasal duct.—Heister's valve, folds of mucous membrane at the neck of the gall bladder and in the cystic duct, which present the appearance of a spiral valve. See cut under stomach.—Hydraulic, hypopygial, ileocecal, inferior valve. See the valvular words.—Ileocolic valve. Same as ileocecal valve.—Kingston's valve, a conical valve forming the outlet of the blow-off pipe of a marine engine. It opens through the side of a vessel by turning a screw.—Long valve, in a steam-engine, same as slid-valve, which see, under slid.—Low-water valve, a valve which opens automatically and allows steam to escape when the water in an engine-boiler is reduced too low for safety. —Mitral valve, a valve formed by two triangular folds of the endocardium, or inner lining of the heart, situated at the opening between the left ventricle and the auricle, and serving to prevent regurgitation of blood into the latter cavity. Also bicuspid valve. See cut under heart.—Oral valves. See oral.—Oscillating valve, a steam valve which reciprocates on a pivot. It is frequently used with oscillating steam-engines. —Overpressure valve. See overpressure.—Pocketed valve, a valve fitting into a depression or pocket. —Pot-lid valve. (a) A cap formed valve which shuts down like a cover upon a port or the end of a pipe. (b) The cover of the air-pump of a steam-engine. E. H. Knight.—Pulmonary valves. See pulmonary, and cut under heart.—Pulmonic valves. Same as pulmonary valves.—Pyloric valve. (a) A small tubercle situated at the anterior angle of the trigonum of the bladder. (b) Any formation serving to obstruct or close the pyloric orifice of the stomach. A pylorus may have a valvular construction, or a muscular sphincter may surround the orifice. See pylorus, 2 (b).—Regulator-valve, a throttle-valve.—Reverse valve, in boilers, a valve opening inward to the pressure of the atmosphere when there is a negative pressure in the boiler. —Rotary valve. See rotary.—Semilunar aortic valve, semilunar pulmonary valve. See semilunar, and cut under heart.—Semilunar valve of the brain. Same as valvula of Vieussens.—Sigmoid valve. See sigmoid.—Spiral valve. See spiral.—Steam-thrown valve, in a steam-engine or steam-pump, a valve moved by direct steam-pressure, without the intervention of an eccentric, crank, cam, or valve-stem. See cut under rock-drill.—Thebesian valve. See Thebesian.—Tricuspid valve. See tricuspid.—Twin valve. See twin.—Undershut valve, a valve placed beneath the sole plate of a pump or other mechanism, as distinguished from one placed above the plate, and closed by a force acting from below upward. E. H. Knight.—Valve of Amussat. Same as Heister's valve.—Valve of Bauhin. Same as ileocecal valve.—Valve of Hasner. See Hasner's valve.—Valve of Tarnus. Same as valvula of Vieussens.—Valve of Thebesius. See Thebesian valve.—Valve of Tulpus. Same as ileocecal valve.—Valve of Varolus. Same as ileocecal valve.—Valve of Vieussens the delicate transparent roof of the anterior part of the fourth ventricle, continuous anteriorly with the postoptici, posteriorly with the cerebellum; the superior medullary velum. —Valves of Kerkring, the valvula conniventes of the intestine (which see, under valvula).—Valves of the heart. See coronary, mitral, aortic, and tricuspid.—Valves of the lymphatics. See lymphatic.—Valves of the veins, folds of the lining membrane of the veins, most numerous in those of the lower extremities, which serve to inhibit or prevent the backward flow of blood in those vessels.

Valve-bucket (valv'buk'et), n. A bucket fitted with a valve; specifically, a pump-bucket or bucket.

Valve-chamber (valv'cham-bér), n. The chamber in which a pump-valve or a steam-valve operates. See cuts under rock-drill, slid-valve, and steam-engine.

Valve-cock (valv'kok), n. A form of cock or faucet which is closed by the dropping of a valve or plug. E. H. Knight.

Valve-coupling (valv'kup-ling), n. A pipe coupling connecting a valve.

Valve of a steam engine.

valved (valvd), a. [< valve + -ed2.] Having a valve or valves, in any sense; valvate; valvular.

valve-file (valv'fil), n. A machinists' file having two acute and two obtuse angles, used in finishing valves, splines, feathers, key-ways, etc. L. H. Knight.

valve-gear (valv'gér), n. Mechanism employed in operating a valve.

valveless (valv'les), a. [< valve + -less.] Having no valve.

valvelet (valv'let), n. [< valve + -let.] A little valve; a valvule.

valve-motion (valv'mô'shon), n. Same as valve-gear.

valve-pallet (valv'pal-et), n. Same as pallet2, 5.

valve-seat (valv'sēt), n. In mach., the surface upon which a valve rests.

valve-stem (valv'stem), n. A rod like a piston-rod by which a valve is moved. See cuts under slid-valve, steam-engine, and passenger-engine.

valve-tailed (valv'täld), a. Noting a Brazilian bat, Myotis albus, the end of whose tail occupies a valve-like formation of the interfemoral membrane.

valve-view (valv'vü), n. and a. I. n. In bot., the valvial aspect of a diatom. Also called side-view. See valvial.

II. a. Noting a position in which a valve-view is presented; valvial.

valviferous (val-vif'e-rus), a. [< L. valva, valve, + ferre = E. bear1.] Bearing a valve; provided with a valve or valvular parts.

valviform (val'vi-fôrm), a. [< L. valva, the leaf of a door (see valve), + forma, form.] Forming or acting as a valve; valvular; valvate. Also valviform.

valvula (val'vü-lä), n.; pl. valvulae (-lê). [NL.; see valvula.] In anat., same as valve.—Valvula Bauhini, the ileocecal valve.—Valvula conniventes, transverse folds of the mucous membrane and underlying tissues found throughout a large extent of the small intestine. Their use is probably to retard somewhat the passage of the alimentary mass, and at the same time to offer a greater surface for absorption.—Valvula Heisteri, folds of the mucous membrane, in the neck of the gall-bladder and in the cystic duct, which present the appearance of a spiral valve. See cut under stomach.—Valvula Vieussensii, the valve of Vieussens (which see, under valve).

valvular (val'vü-lär), a. [< valvula + -ar3.] Of or pertaining to a valve or valvula; also, having the character of a valve; valviform.—Valvular disease, disease of one or more of the valves of the heart.—Valvular sinus. See sinus.

valvule (val'vül), n. [< F. valvule; < L. valvula, valvula, dim. of valva, the leaf of a door, etc.; see valve.] 1. A little valve. Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) The valvula or valve of Vieussens. (2) One of the valvula conniventes. (b) In bot., a name formerly given to the inner or flowering glumes of grasses. (c) In entom., a corneous piece at the base of the haustellum of sucking insects, corresponding to the labrum in the mandibulate mouth. Kirby and Spence.—Interventricular valvules. See interventricular.

valvulitis (val-vü-li'tis), n. [NL.; < valvula + -itis.] Inflammation of the tissues forming a valve, usually one of the valves of the heart.

vambrace (vam'bräs), n. [Also vantbrace, vant-bras, vambrace; abbr. < F. avant-bras, < avant, before, in front, + bras, arm; see van2, avant, and brace1.] The piece of armor which protects the forearm from the elbow-joint to the wrist, whether covering the outer part of the arm only and worn over the sleeve of mail (compare garde-bras and brassart), or inclosing the whole forearm in a cylinder of iron. See cut under perbrace.

vambraced (vam'bräst), a. [< vambrace + -ed2.] Incased in armor; said of an arm, especially when used in heraldry as a bearing. Also unbraced.

vamose (va-môs'), v. i. and t.; pret. and pp. vamosed, ppr. vamosing. [< Sp. amos, 1st pers. pl. pres. ind. (acting as 1st and 2d pl. impv.), used with inf. ir, go; < L. radimus, 1st pers. pl. ind. of radere, go, = E. wade; see wade.] To be off; be gone; decamp from. [Slang.]

Paul had nosuch visions; he did not see human lives as pictures, as tableaux-vivants. He was sincerely sorry that Hollis had vamosed in that way.

C. F. Woodson, Jupiter Lights, xxxi.

vamp<sup>1</sup> (vamp), n. [< ME. campe, ramppe, rampay, campus (also wampe, wampay), earlier rampet, rampet (in pl. rampet), vamppe, < OF. ramppe, aphetic form of avant-pied, F. avant-pied, the forepart of the foot, < avant, before, + pied, foot: see van<sup>2</sup> and foot.] 1. That part of the upper leather of a boot or shoe which is in front of the seam at the ankle. See cut under boot.

As a cobbler sews a vamp up.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xlviii.

2. Any piece or patch intended to give an old thing a new appearance; a piece added for appearance' sake. See the verb.—3. A protection formerly worn for the ankle and leg, and perhaps for the foot also. It seems to have been in most cases a sort of gaiter or spatterdash.—4. In music, an improvised accompaniment.

vamp<sup>1</sup> (vamp), v. [ME. rampagen; < vamp<sup>1</sup>, n.] 1. trans. 1. To furnish with a new vamp or upper leather, as a shoe or boot.

Item, j. payre of blake hosyn, vamped with lether
Paston Letters, I. 476.

What a time did we endure

In two-penny commons, and in boots twice vamp'd!

Middleton, Massinger, and Rowley, Old Law, ii. 1.

2. To repair; furnish up; give an appearance of newness to.

He drill you how to give the lie, stab in the punto, if you dare not fight, then how to vamp a rotten quarrel without ado.
Dekker and Ford, Sun's Darling, ii.

A new play, or an old one new vamped, by Shadwell, called "The Royall Shepherdess"; but the silliest for words and design, and everything, that ever I saw in my whole life.
Pepys's Diary, IV. 109.

A pert vamping chaise-undertaker, stepping nimbly across the street, demanded if monsieur would have his chaise refitted.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, vii. 29.

3. In music, to improvise an accompaniment to. [Colloq.]

As soon as I could get in to vamp the tunes on the banjo a little, I went at it too.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, III. 191.

To vamp up, to hatch up; make up or put together out of odds and ends, or out of nothing.

I sat myself down and vamped up a fine flaunting poetical panegyric.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxx.

The "Half-Pay Officer," a vamped-up farce, by Molloy.
Doran, Annals of the Stage, I. xvii.

II. intrans. To improvise musical accompaniments. [Colloq.]

vamp<sup>2</sup> (vamp), v. i. [Origin obscure.] To travel; proceed; move forward.

How much of my life has been trifled away in beaten tracks, where I vamped on with others, only to follow those that went before us.
Locke, To A. Collins, Oct. 29, 1703.

vampy<sup>2</sup> (vamp'pér), v. i. [Appar. a var. or corruption of vapor.] To make an ostentatious appearance. [Local, Scotch.]

vampire (vam'pír), n. and a. [Formerly also vampyre; < F. vampire = Sp. Pg. vampiro = D. vampier = G. vampyr = Sw. Dan. vampyr (NL. vampyrus), < Serv. vampir = Bulg. vampir, vampir, vepir, vupir = Pol. vampir, also upior = Little Russ. vampyr, vepyr, vopyr, opyr, upyr, opir, uper = White Russ. upir = Russ. vampir, also upiri, upyri, obyri (the Pol. vampir, Russ. vampir, appar. < Serv.), a vampire; cf. North Turk. uber, a witch.] 1. n. 1. A kind of spectral being or ghost still possessing a human body, which, according to a superstition existing among the Slavic and other races on the lower Danube, leaves the grave during the night, and maintains a semblance of life by sucking the warm blood of living men and women while they are asleep. Dead wizards, werewolves, heretics, and other outcasts become vampires, as do also the illegitimate offspring of parents themselves illegitimate, and any one killed by a vampire. On the discovery of a vampire's grave, the body, which, it is supposed, will be found all fresh and ruddy, must be disinterred, thrust through with a whitethorn stake, and burned in order to render it harmless.

2. Hence, a person who preys on others; an extortioner or blood-sucker.—3. Same as vampire-bat.—4. Theat., a small trap made of two flaps held together by a spring, used for sudden appearances and disappearances of one person.—False vampire, a leaf-nosed bat of South America, erroneously supposed to suck blood. See vampire-bat (b)

(1), and cut under Vampire. Spectacled vampire. Same as spectacled stowderm (which see, under stowderm).

II. a. Of or pertaining to a vampire; resembling a vampire in character; blood-sucking; extortionate; vampiric.

The strong but disinterested wish to co-operate in restoring this noble University to its natural pre-eminence by relieving it from the vampire oppression under which it has pined so long in almost lifeless exhaustion.

Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions, p. 446.

vampire-bat (vam'pír-bat), n. One of several different species of bats. (a) One of various large frugivorous bats of Africa, Asia, and the Malay archipelago, commonly called flyng-fozes, such as the species of Pteropus, Harpia, etc. The name appears to be due to some superstition, or to a fancied resemblance of these creatures to the spectral beings denominated vampires. (b) One of various bats of South America, of the insectivorous division of the order Chiroptera, only a few of which are noted for sucking blood. (1) There are numerous species of several genera of the family Phyllostomidae, among them the Phyllostoma spectrum, popularly known as the vampire-bat, some two feet in expanse of wing. But this species, like most others of the family, is perfectly harmless. (2) The bats which actually suck blood belong to the genera Desmodus and Diphylla, for which a special group named Hæmatophilina or Desmodontes has been formed, and which are also sometimes separated as a family, Desmodidae. These have a small bilid foliaceous appendage on the nose; the tail and interfemoral membrane are little developed. Their peculiar characteristics are two large projecting upper incisors and two lancet-shaped superior canine teeth, all sharp-pointed, and so arranged as to make a triple puncture like that of the leech; a tongue capable of considerable extension, and furnished at its extremity with a number of papillæ arranged so as to form an organ of suction; and an intestine relatively shorter than in any other mammal. Altogether their structure points them out as designed to live on blood alone. They attack horses and cattle, and sometimes even man in his sleep. Also vampire and vampire. See cuts under Desmodontes.

vampiric (vam'pír'ik), a. [< vampire + -ic.] Having the character of a vampire; pertaining to vampires or the belief in them: as, vampiric habits, literature, or superstition.

vampirism (vam'pír-izm), n. [= F. vampirisme; as vampire + -ism.] 1. Belief in the existence of vampires. See vampire, 1.

Vampirism prevails all over Russia, Persia, Greece, Bohemia, and Poland, but especially in the Danubian Principalities.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 754.

2. The action of a vampire-bat; the act or practice of blood-sucking.—3. Figuratively, the practice of extortion or preying on others. Carlyle, French Rev., II. iii. 2.

vamplate (vam'plät), n. [Formerly also vamp-plate; < F. avant-plat, 'fore-plate,' < avant, before, in front, + plat, plate: see plate.] 1. The plate of iron carried upon the lance, the lance passing through it. It served as a protection for the hand when the lance was couched. It was originally a roundel, but in the armor of the just attained very large dimensions. Also avantplat, lance-plate.

Amphialus was run through the vamplate, and under the arm, so as, the staff appearing behind him, it seemed to the beholders he had been in danger.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

2. In her., a bearing representing a gauntlet. Berry. The name vamplate, applied to this bearing, is a mistake arising at a time when medieval armor was not understood.

vamplet (vam'plet), n. An old form of vamplate.

vampyret, n. See vampire.
Vampyri (vam'pí-rí), n. pl. [NL., pl. of vampyrus: see vampire.] A group of typical phyllostomine bats (subfamily Phyllostomatinae of the family Phyllostomatidae) confined to the New World. They have a well-developed nose-leaf, more or less horseshoe-shaped in front and lanceolate behind, large interfemoral membrane, long narrow snout, incisors 2 or 3, and premolars 1 or 2. Though called vampires, these bats are not the true blood-suckers, but include numerous insectivorous and frugivorous species, referable to several genera. See vampire bat (b), and compare Desmodontes.

Vamplate of Lance of the end of the 14th century. (From Violet le Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français")

False Vampire Phyllostoma spectabile, one of the Vampyri.

Vampyridæ (vam'pí-rí-dæ), n. pl. [NL. (Bona-parte, 1837). < Vampyrus + -idæ.] A family of bats supposed to be vampires; the Vampyri.

Vampyrus (vam'pí-rus), n. [NL. (Leach): see vampire.] The name-giving genus of phyllostomine bats of the group Vampyri (where see cut): inexactly synonymous with Phyllostoma.

vamuret, n. Same as vampire.

1. A fan or other contrivance for winnowing grain.

Fan. . . A Vanne, or winnowing Sieve. Cotgrave.

The other token of their ignorance of the sea was that they should not know an ear, but call it a corn-van.

Broome, Notes on the Odyssey, xi. 152.

2. [< van<sup>1</sup>, v.] In mining, a test of the value of an ore, made by washing (vanning) a small quantity, after powdering it, on the point of a shovel. Vanning is to a Cornish miner what washing in the horn spoon is to the Mexican. See van<sup>1</sup>, v., 2.

"If you could only get that motion into a machine," said a gentleman, as he watched the process of making a van on a shovel, and saw the copper roll up to the highest point, "it would beat the world for slime-dressing."
F. G. Coggin, Trans. Am. Inst. Min. Eng., XII. 64.

3. A vane, as of a feather; hence, a wing.

His vans no longer could his flight sustain.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xii. 750.

As bats at the wired windows of a dairy,
They beat their vans.

van<sup>1</sup> (van), v. t.; pret. and pp. vanned, ppr. vanning. [< F. vanner, < L. vannere, fan, winnow, < vannus, a fan: see van<sup>1</sup>, n., and cf. fan, v.] 1. t. To winnow; fan.

Vanner. To vanne or winnow. Cotgrave.

The winnowing, vanning, and laying . . . up of corne.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xviii. 32.

2. In mining, to separate, as ore from vein-stone, by washing it on the point of a shovel. See van, n., 2, and vanner.

van<sup>2</sup> (van), n. [Abbr. of vanguard (due to association of vanguard and rearguard, whence van, supposed to be related to vanguard as rear to rearguard.)] 1. The foremost division of an army on the march, or of a fleet when sailing; hence, by extension, the front of an army when in line of battle: opposed to rear.

The foe he had surveyed,
Ranged, as to him they did appear,
With van, main-battle, wings, and rear.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. ii. 104.

We too can boast of no ignoble spoils;
But those my ship contains; whence distant far,
I fight conspicuous in the van of war.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 350.

2. The leaders of any movement in which many are engaged; the foremost individuals of any moving body; the front of any advancing body; the front generally: literally or figuratively.

Sir Roger, you shall have the van and lead the way.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, v.

Come, firm Resolve, take thou the van.

Burns, To Dr. Blacklock.

Doc. Meggar, too, leading the van, sends back over his shoulder the Parthian arrow of a single oath.

W. M. Baker, Men Timothy, p. 200.

van<sup>3</sup> (van), n. [Abbr. of caravan, regarded perhaps as **carry-van* (cf. cariole, taken as carry-all): see caravan.] 1. Any large covered carriage; specifically, a large covered wagon used in moving furniture and household effects.—2. A kind of vehicle, sometimes covered and sometimes open, used by tradesmen and others for carrying light goods, etc.—3. A close carriage attached to a railway-train, for carrying passengers' luggage, for the accommodation of the guard, etc. [Great Britain.]

van<sup>3</sup> (van), v. t. [< van<sup>3</sup>, n.] To carry or transport in a van.

van-. A shortened form of avant.
vanadate (van'a-dät), n. [< vanad(ic) + -ate.] A salt of vanadic acid.

vanadate (vā-nā'di-ät), n. [< vanadium + -ate.] Same as vanadate.

vanadic (vā-nad'ik), a. [< vanadium + -ic.] 1. Related to or containing vanadium.—2. Containing vanadium with its maximum valence.—Vanadic acid,  $H_2VO_4$ , a vanadium acid, analogous to phosphoric acid, not known in the free state, but forming well-defined salts.

vanadiferous (van-a-dif'e-rus), a. [< NL. vanadium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear.] In chem., containing or yielding vanadium.

Macaulay, Milton.

vandyke van-dik'ē, v. t.: pret. and pp. vandyked, ppr. vandyking. [< Vandyke, n.] To cut the edge of, as a piece of dress, in points, in points, after the manner of a Vandyke collar.

vane (văn), n. [ME. vane, a var. of fane, < AS. fana, a flag, banner: see fan<sup>1</sup>.] 1t.
2. A weathercock; a device which is moved by the wind in such a manner as to show the wind's direction; a weather-vane.

[iii, 1, 66.

3. A device used on shipboard to answer the purpose of a weathercock; generally called dog-race. It is usually along slender cone of bunting, which is hoisted at the masthead and blows in the wind, pointing away from the quarter from which the wind comes.

4. A device similar to a weather-vane, attached to an axis, and having a surface exposed to a moving current, as in an anemometer or a water-meter.—5. In ornith., the web of a feather on either side of the shaft; the pogonium; the vexillum. Also used of an arrow. See feather, and cuts under after-shaft and penning.

The arrows having the broader vanes will fall shorter than those having the narrower ones.

M. and W. Thompson, Archery, p. 33.

6. One of the plates or blades of a windmill, a screw propeller, and the like. See cuts under screw propeller (under screw), and smoke-jack—

7. In surveying-instruments: (a) A horizontal piece of wood or metal slipping on a leveling-staff. It is raised or lowered to any point of the staff to indicate the plane of apparent level at which it is cut by the axis of the telescope. See leveling-staff. Also called target. (b) The sight of a quadrant or similar instrument for the measurement of angles, marking the direction from the eye to the object.

vaned (vānd), a. [< vane + -ed<sup>2</sup>.] Furnished with a vane or vanes.

vaneless (vān'les), a. Having no vane: as, a vaneless windmill.

Vanellus (vā-nel'us), n. [NL. (Brissou, 1760), after F. vanneau, lapwing, so called with ref. to the sound made by its wings; < ML. vanellus, vanellus, dim. of L. vanus, a fau; see van.]

A genus of plover-like grallatorial birds, of the family Charadriidae, having four toes, a long recurved occipital crest, lustrous plumage, and no spur on the wing; the true lapwings. It includes the well-known pewit or lapwing of Europe, V. cristatus, and a few similar species. See cuts under lap-wing, plover (egg), and Presipogon.

Vanessa (vā-nēs'ā), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1808), said to be intended for **Phanessa*, < Gr. Φαῖνη, a mystic divinity in the Orphic system.] 1. A notable genus of butterflies, used variously by

rived from the name of the discoverer, Captain Vancouver, the discoverer, who visited the western coast of America (1791-4).] A genus of polypetalous plants of the order Hamamelidaceae and tribe Hamamelideae. It is represented by twelve to fifteen species, all of which are native and are mostly shrubs or small trees, some of them two to six feet tall. The leaves are alternate, ovate, growing on long petioles. The flowers are large and are borne in a terminal raceme. The fruit is a capsule, which is covered with a thick, leathery skin. The seeds are large and are covered with a thick, leathery skin. The plant has been found in the Pacific Northwest, in the mountains of the Sierra Nevada, and in the mountains of the Sierra Nevada. It is found in the Pacific Northwest, in the mountains of the Sierra Nevada, and in the mountains of the Sierra Nevada.

Vandalism (van'dal-izm), n. [= F. vandalisme; vandal + -ism.] 1. The conduct of Vandals. Hence—2. [t. c.] Willful or ignorant destruction of artistic or literary treasures; hostility to or irreverence or contempt for what is beautiful or venerable.

Vandae (van'de-eh), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), = Vanda + -ae.] A tribe of orchids, characterized by a single posterior opercular anther, its cords almost always confluent at maturity, and closely incumbent above a horizontal rostellum, to which the waxy pollen-masses are affixed by a small thick or scale-like gland, which is often prolonged into a distinct caulicle or stalk. It includes about 110 genera, classed in 5 tribes, the types of which are the genera Eulophium, Cymbidium, Cyclopogon, Stachopus, Maudslayi, Oncidium, Sarcodictyon, and Nolida. These genera alone include over 400 tropical species, and are all, except perhaps the first and last, highly prized in cultivation. The Nolida and Pseudochilus are aberrant in their erect rostellum, and are thus transitional to the tribe Neottieae. The two globose or oblong pollen-masses, each sometimes basiflex, are very readily removed by insect or artificial aid, and insure cross-fertilization. The genera are nearly all epiphytic. They often produce pseudo-bulbs, but not tubers; their stems are erect, or reduced to a creeping rootstock adhering to trees or stones; their inflorescence is usually lateral, very rarely, as in Cyrtopogon, a terminal raceme. The flowers are commonly large and handsome, many of the most valuable among orchids belonging here, as Arces, Miltonia, Sarcodictyon, Odontolobos, Phalaenopsis, Zygopetalum, Laciste, Catasetum, and Peristeria. See, under Phalaenopsis.

Vandellia (van-del'-i-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767), named after the Italian Vandelli, who wrote in 1788 on Portuguese and Brazilian plants.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Scrophulariales and tribe Gratiolaceae, type of the subtribe Vandellieae. It is distinguished from the related genus Tysanthera by its four perfect stamens. There are about 30 species, natives of warm parts of the Old World, 2 species, V. crustacea and V. peltata, are introduced into America. They are usually much-branched, annuals, with opposite leaves, and small flowers, which are solitary in the axils, or form a terminal raceme or umbel. Saxifraga and Phlox are

Vandyke (van-dik'), n. and a. [Short for Vandyke collar, so called from Vandyke (Anthony Van Dyck, 1599–1641), a Flemish painter.] I. a. 1. One of a series of relatively large points forming an edge or border, as of lace, ribbon, cloth, etc.

An immense straw bonnet, tied down with satin ribbons, exhibiting two bows, the edges of which were cut in van-der-Hoven, The Post-Captain, xv.

The one which had previously been disturbed was a drinking cup ornamented with randykes.

2. A Vandyke cape or collar. See II.—3. A painting by Vandyke.—4. A small cape resembling a very broad collar, worn by women and girls in the first quarter of the nineteenth century.

II. — Pertaining to the style of dress represented in portraits by Vandyke; especially, ornamented with relatively large points forming a border: noting a broad collar or cape, as of linen.

V. polydorus and V. urtica are the larger and smaller tortoiseshells. The comma butterfly is sometimes placed in this genus. See also cut under painted lady.
2. [l. c.] A butterfly of this genus.

Vanessina (van-e-sī'nē, n. pl. [NL., < Vanessa + -ina].) A subfamily of Nymphalidae, named from the genus Vanessa. It includes also the genera Gynthis and Graphis. All the species are sometimes called angeliwings.

vanessoid (vā-nēs'oid), a. and n. I. a. Resembling or related to a butterfly of the genus Vanessa; belonging to the Vanessinae.

II. n. A butterfly of this group.

van-foss (van'fōs), n. [< F. avant-fosse, < avant, before, + fosse, ditch, trench: see foss2.] In fort., a ditch on the outside of the counterscarp.

vang (vang), n. [< D. vang, a catch, a curb (< vangen, catch), = E. fang: see fang.] A guy extending from the end of a gaff to the ship's rail on each side, and serving to steady the gaff.

Vanga (vang'gā), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < L. vanga, a mutton.] 1. A genus of shrike-like birds of Madagascar. The name was applied by Lesson in 1831 to the African shrikes often called Malacomis, and by Swainson in 1837 to certain shrike-like birds of Australia. It has lately been adopted by G. R. Gray in its original acceptance. As originally or very early used by Buffon, and as generically retained by Cuvier, it applied especially to Lanius curvirostris (Gmelin) of Madagascar.

2. [l. c.] A shrike of the genus Vanga; the hook-billed shrike, V. curvirostris, or the rufous shrike, V. rufa—both of Madagascar.

vanga-shrike (vang'gā-shrik), n. A vanga.

vangee (van'jē), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A contrivance for working the pumps of a ship by means of a barrel and crank-brakes.

vanglo, vangloe (vang'glō), n. [W. Ind.] Sesame or til. [West Indies.]

vanguard (van'gārd), n. [Formerly vantgard; by apheresis from avantgarde, < F. avant-garde, < avant, before, + garde, guard: see guard.] A detachment of an army whose duty it is to guard against surprise from the front and to clear the way; the van. Compare van2.

vanilla (vā-nīl'ā), n. [= F. vanille, < NL. vanilla, < Sp. vainilla, formerly vainilla, the pod or bean of the vanilla-plant, hence also the plant itself (also applied to heliotrope), lit. 'little pod,' dim. of vaina, scabbard, sheath, pod, < L. vagina, sheath: see vagina.] 1. A plant of the genus Vanilla (see def. 3), especially one of several species yielding the vanilla of commerce.

Flowering Branch of Vanilla planifolia, a, the fruit.

V. planifolia is by far the largest source; but other species, as V. aromatica and V. grandiflora, are also grown for use. Vanilla is most largely produced in Mexico, the product being obtained to a great extent from the wild plant; but the plant is also found, either wild or in cultivation, in various parts of Central and South America, and is more or less grown in many warm countries, notably in Mauritius and the Seychelles, Java, and Tahiti. On the isthmus of Panama the fruit of Selenipedium Chica, and perhaps of some other orchids, there known as canilla chica, or little vanilla, is used like that of true vanilla. The vanilla-plant is a climber easily propagated by cuttings, beginning to bear when three years old, and continuing thirty or forty years. The flowers need to be artificially fertilized, except in the plant's natural habitat, where fertilization is effected by insects. The fruit is a long fleshy pod, known as vanilla-bean, from its form, not from its seeds, which are minute.

2. The vanilla-bean or its economic extract. The valuable property of the bean, which resides in a volatile oil (see vanillin), is developed by a slow process of curing involving fermentation. The extract has a peculiar agreeable odor and aromatic taste. It has the medicinal property of an aromatic stimulant, with some effect upon the nervous system. Its chief use, however, is in the preparation of liquors, in perfumery, and as a flavoring of chocolate, confectionery, creams, etc.

3. [cap.] [NL. (Plumier, 1703).] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Neottieae, type of the subtribe Vanillae. It is characterized by having tall climbing and branching leafy stems, and large flowers with a broad concave stalked lip, at the base rolled about the column, to which the stalk is adnate. There are about 20 species, widely scattered through the tropics. They are robust climbers, sending out adventitious roots, by which they cling to trees, and bearing thick fleshy or coriaceous leaves. The flowers are usually large, often abundant, and of delicious fragrance, chiefly white and red, in several economic species green. The dark-brown pods are 6 to 9 inches long, and are filled with a dark oily odoriferous pulp. (See def. 1 and vanilloes.) The Jamaican species are there known as greenwithe and purplelip. V. planifolia occurs also in Florida along the everglades, where its green flowers reach about 2 inches in diameter. V. lutescens and V. Phalenopsis are cultivated under glass for their flowers, which are large and handsome, yellowish, white, or orange. — Frosted vanilla (F. vanille givrée), vanilla-beans upon the surface of which vanillin appears in frost-like crystals: the best quality. A. W. Harrison. — Wild vanilla, a composite plant, Trilisa (Liatris) odoratissima, found from North Carolina to Florida and Louisiana. It is a rather tall erect plant with numerous small rose-purple heads in a cymose panicle. The leaves have a persistent vanilla-like fragrance, and are considerably used to improve the odor of tobacco. The root-leaves are much larger than the others, and gain for the plant the name also of deer's-tongue or hound's-tongue.

vanilla-bean (vā-nīl'ā-bēn), n. The fruit of the plant vanilla. See vanilla, 1 and 2.

vanilla-grass (vā-nīl'ā-grās), n. A grass of the genus Hierochloë, chiefly H. borealis; holy-grass. The large-leaved vanilla-grass is H. macrophylla of California. See Hierochloë.

vanilla-plant (vā-nīl'ā-plant), n. 1. See vanilla, 1 and 3. — 2. Same as wild vanilla (which see, under vanilla).

vanillic (vā-nīl'ik), a. [< vanill(in) + -ic.] Related to or derived from vanilla. — Vanillic acid, a monobasic crystalline acid obtained by the oxidation of its aldehyde vanillin.

vanillin (vā-nīl'in), n. [< vanilla + -in2.] The neutral odoriferous principle ( $C_8H_8O_3$ ) of vanilla. It forms crystalline needles having a hot, biting taste, soluble in hot water and in alcohol. It is now prepared artificially from coniferin and from oil of cloves, and used as a flavoring extract.

vanillism (vā-nīl'izm), n. [< vanilla + -ism.] An affection observed among workers in vanilla, characterized by an itching papular eruption of the skin, irritation of the nasal mucous membrane, headache, vertigo, pains in the muscles, and great prostration. It is supposed to be due to a poisonous action of the vanilla or of the oil of cashew with which the pods are coated.

vaniloquent (vā-nīl'ō-kwēns), n. [*< L. vaniloquentia, < *vaniloquen(t)-s, vaniloquent: see vaniloquent.*] Idle talk; vain babbling. Blount, Glossographia (1670).

vaniloquent (vā-nīl'ō-kwēnt), a. [*< L. *vaniloquen(t)-s, vaniloquent, < vanus, empty, + loquen(t)-s, ppr. of loqui, speak, talk.*] Talking idly or vainly. Bailey, 1727.

vanish (van'ish), v. i. [*< ME. vanisshēn, vanisshēn, vānschen, < OF. vaniss- (stem of certain parts of *vanir = It. vanire, pres. vanisco), < L. vanescere, disappear, be in vain, < vanus, empty, vain: see vain.*] 1. To disappear quickly; pass from a visible to an invisible state; become imperceptible.

The heavens shall vanish away like smoke. Isa. II. 6.

Of the vanished dream
No image was there left to him.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 96.

2. To pass out of view; pass beyond the limit of vision; disappear gradually; fade away.

Now when she [the queen] could no longer detain the Empire from her son, not enduring to survive her glory, she vanisht out of sight. Sandys, Traavales, p. 118.

3. To pass away; be annihilated or lost; be no more.

Pick'd from the worm-holes of long-vanish'd days.
Shak., Hen. V., ii. 4. 86.

Before Atrides' rage so sinks the foe,
Whole squadrons vanish, and proud heads lie low.
Pope, Iliad, xi. 206.

All must feel that by his [Shelley's] subtle sense of beauty he caught many a vanishing hue of earth and sky which no poet before him had noticed.

J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 151.

4. To rise or be given off, as breath; exhale. [Rare.]

A gentler judgment vanish'd from his lips.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 3. 10.

5. In math., to become zero. — Vanishing circle. See circle. Vanishing fraction, in alg. See fraction.

Vanishing line, in persp., the line which represents the line at infinity in which any given plane cuts all parallel planes. — Vanishing plane, in relief persp., the plane which represents the plane at infinity, and thus contains all vanishing points and vanishing lines. — Vanishing point, in persp., the point which represents the point at infinity in which an imaginary line passing through the eye of the observer parallel to any straight line of an object to be drawn cuts that line produced and all parallel lines; hence, colloquially and in confusion with sense 5, the point or condition of disappearance of anything.

The margin of profit has been reduced to vanishing-point.
Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 72.

Vanishing stress. See stress.

vanish (van'ish), n. [< vanish, v.] In phonetics, a sound with which another principal sound vanishes or ends, as the ō-sound of ā (the i in ei as pronounced in veil), or the ō-sound of ō (the u in ou as pronounced in soul).

vanisher (van'ish-ēr), n. [< vanish + -er1.] One who disappears or vanishes. Whittier.

vanishingly (van'ish-ing-li), adv. In a vanishing manner; so as to vanish; imperceptibly: as, a certain probability is vanishingly small.

vanishment (van'ish-ment), n. [< vanish + -ment.] A vanishing.

Vanist (vā'nist), n. [< Vane (see def.) + -ist.] One of the New England Antinomians, about 1637: so called from Sir Henry Vane, governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1636.

vanited (van'it-id), a. [< vanity + -ed2.] Affected with vanity. [Rare.]

I am exasperated against your foolish, your low-vanited Lovelace.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 86. (Davies.)

vanity (van'ī-ti), n.; pl. vanities (-tiz). [Early mod. E. vanite, vanitie; < ME. vanitee, vanite, < OF. vanite, vanitet, F. vanité = Pr. vanitat, vanetat = Sp. vanidad = Pg. vaidade = It. vanità, < L. vanita(-s), emptiness, vanity, < vanus, empty, vain: see vain.] 1. The character or state of being vain. (a) Worthlessness; futility; falsity; unsubstantialness; unrealness; illusion; deception; emptiness; folly; want of substance to satisfy desire; hollowness.

rated vapor. Aqueous vapor is always present as a minor constituent of the atmosphere, and its amount which is very variable both at different places on the earth's surface and in the same locality at different times, forms an important element of climate. By a reduction of temperature the aqueous vapor in the air is brought to the so-called state of saturation, and then condensed into cloud, mist, and rain. See rain.

It would be an error to confound clouds or fog or any visible mist with the vapor of water; this vapor is a perfectly impalpable gas, diffused, even on the clearest days, throughout the atmosphere.

Tyndall, Radiation, § 12.

3†. Effluence; influence.

Man, bryd, best, fish, herbe, and grene tre,
They fele in tymes, with vapour eterne,
God loveth, and to love wold nocht wernie.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 11.

4†. Wind; flatulence.

For that that causeth gaping . . . or stretching is when the spirits are a little heavy, by any vapour or the like.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 296.

5. In med., a class of remedies, officinal in the British pharmacopœia, which are to be applied by inhalation: such as vapor creasoti, a mixture of 12 minims of creosote in 8 fluidounces of boiling water, the vapor of which is to be inhaled.—6. Something unsubstantial, fleeting, or transitory; vain imagination; fantastic notion.

Gentlemen, these are very strange vapours, and very idle vapours.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

7†. pl. A hectoring or bullying style of language or conduct, adopted by ranters and swaggers with the purpose of bringing about a real or mock quarrel.

They are at it [quarrelling] still, sir; this they call vapours.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iv. 3.

8. pl. A disease of nervous debility in which strange images seem to float hazily before the eyes, or appear as if real; hence, hypochondriacal affections; depression of spirit; dejection; spleen; "the blues": a term much affected in the eighteenth century, but now rarely used.

Some call it the fever on the spirits, some a nervous fever, some the vapours, and some the hysterics.

Fielding, Amelia, iii. 7.

Caused by a dearth of scandal, should the vapours
Distress our fair ones—let them read the papers.

Garrick, Prol. to Sheridan's School for Scandal.

But really these thick walls are enough to inspire the vapours if one never had them before.

Miss Burney, Cecilia, vi. 2.

Aqueous vapor. See aqueous.

vapor, vapour (vā'por), v. [*< ME. vapouren, < OF. *vaporer = Sp. P. g. vaporar = It. vaporare, < L. vaporare, intr. steam, reek, tr. steam, smoke, heat, warm, < vapor, exhalation, steam, vapor: see vapor, n.*] I. intrans. 1†. To pass off in the form of vapor; dissolve, as into vapor or thin air; be exhaled; evaporate.

Sette it to a litle fier so that it vapoure not.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 8.

2. To give out vapor, steam, or gas; emit vapors or exhalations; exhale; steam.

Swift-running waters vapour not so much as standing waters.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 767.

In the rear of the place stood a cooking-stove, upon which usually fized and vapored a fragrant mess of something which looked like sausages, and smelled like onions.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX., Literary Notes.

3. To boast or vaunt; bully; hector; brag; swagger; bounce.

Pierce, He's Burst's protection.

Fly. Fights and vapours for him.

B. Jonson, New Inn, iii. 1.

He vapours like a tinker, and struts like a juggler.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iv. 2.

II. trans. 1. To cause to pass into the state of vapor; cause to dissolve or disappear in or as in vapor, gas, thin air, or other unsubstantial thing.

Vapour it [quicksilver] away in a styllatorie of glasse:
And thus shal yowe fynde the golde in the bottome of the vessell in maner pure without quickesilver.

R. Eden, tr. of Vannuccio Biringuccio (First Books on [America, ed. Arber, p. 366]).

He now is dead, and all his glorie gone,
And all his greatnes vapoured to nought.

Spenser, Ruins of Time, l. 219.

He'd laugh to see one throw his heart away,
Another, sighing, vapour forth his soul.

B. Jonson.

2. To afflict or infect with vapors; dispirit; depress.

He [Dr. Broxholme] always was nervous and vapoured.
Walpole, Letters, II. 120.

Her have I seen, pale, vapour'd through the day,
With crowded parties at the midnight play.

Crabbe, Works, II. 144.

She has lost all her sprightliness, and vapours me but to look at her.

Miss Burney, Camilla, v. 6. (Darcey.)

3. To bully; hector.

His designe was, if he could not refute them, yet at least with quips and snapping adagies to vapour them out.

Milton, Apology for Smeectynnuus.

vaporability (vā'por-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< vaporable + -ity.] The property or state of being vaporable.

vaporable (vā'por-a-bl), a. [= Sp. vaporable = It. vaporabile; as vapor + -able.] Capable of being vaporized or converted into vapor.

The goodness of the mine may be the cause . . . as eyther it is not of vaporable nature or to be of smaule quantitie.

R. Eden, tr. of Vannuccio Biringuccio (First Books on [America, ed. Arber, p. 357]).

vaporarium (vā-pō-rā'ri-um), n.; pl. vaporariums, vaporaria (-umz, -ā). [NL., < L. vaporarium, a steam-pipe in a hot bath, < vapor, steam, vapor: see vapor.] A Russian bath.

vaporate (vā'por-āt), v. i. [< L. vaporatus, pp. of vaporare, emit vapor: see vapor, v.] To emit vapor; evaporate.

vaporation (vā-pō-rā'shōn), n. [= Sp. vaporación = It. vaporazione = L. vaporatio(n)-, < vaporare, emit vapor: see vapor, vaporate.] The act or process of converting into vapor, or of passing off in vapor; evaporation.

vapor-bath (vā'por-bāth), n. 1. The application of the vapor of water to the body in a close apartment.

The physical organization of the Bengalee is feeble even to effeminacy. He lives in a constant vapour bath. His pursuits are sedentary, . . . his movements languid.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. The apartment or bath for such application; an apparatus for bathing the body in vapor.

vapor-burner (vā'por-bēr'nēr), n. A device or apparatus for burning a hydrocarbon in the form of vapor: used for lamps, for heating- and cooking-stoves, etc. In a usual form the hydrocarbon is caused to pass through a metallic part which is so heated by the flame as to vaporize the liquid as it passes through. E. H. Knight.

vapor-douche (vā'por-dōsh), n. A topical vapor-bath which consists in the direction of a jet of aqueous vapor on some part of the body.

vapored, vapoured (vā'pōrd), a. [< vapor + -ed.] 1. Full of vapors; dim or hazy, as if with vapors.

But I . . . kisse the ground whereas the corse doth rest,
With vapour'd eyes, from whence such streames arise
As Pyramus did on Thisbee's bier bewail.

Surrey, Death of Wyatt.

2. Affected with the vapors; dejected; splenetic.

I was become so vapoured and timorous at home that I was ready to faint away if I did but go a few stones cast from our own house.

Whiston, Memoirs (1749), p. 18.

vapor-engine (vā'por-en'jīn), n. A generic term for motors driven by elastic fluids, as hot air, steam, vapors of ammonia, alcohol, etc.

vaporier, vapourer (vā'por-ēr), n. [< vapor + -er.] 1. One who vapors, swaggers, or bullies; one who makes a blustering display of his prowess; a braggart; a blusterer.

A ruffian, a riotous spendthrift, and a notable vapourer,
Camden, Elizabeth, an. 1570.

My Lord Berkeley hath all along been a fortunate, though a passionate and but weak man as to policy, . . . and one that is the greatest vapourer in the world.

Pepys, Diary, II. 331.

2. A vaporier-moth.

vaporier-moth (vā'por-ēr-mōth), n. A common brown moth, Orygia antiqua, the female of which cannot fly; hence, any member of this group; a tussock. See tussock-moth, and cut under Orygia.

vaporiferous (vā-pō-rif'ē-rus), a. [< L. vaporifer, emitting vapor, < vapor, vapor, + ferre = E. bear.] Conveying or producing vapor.

vaporific (vā-pō-rif'ik), a. [< L. vapor, vapor, + -ficus, < facere, make: see -fic.] That converts or is capable of converting into steam or other vapor; exhaling in a volatile form, as fluids.

The statement by Dr. Thomson refers to the completion, or last stage, of the discovery, namely, the vaporific combination of heat.

Buckle, Civilization, II. vi., note.

vaporiform (vā'por-i-fōrm), a. [< L. vapor, vapor, + forma, form.] Existing in the form of vapor.

Steam is water in its vaporiform state.

Ure, Dict., III. 888.

vaporimeter (vā-pō-rim'ē-tēr), n. [< L. vapor, vapor, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the pressure of a vapor, especially one by which the amount of alcohol in a wine or liquor is determined from the height of the column of mercury which its vapor will support.

This last distillate is diluted with water to a 10 per cent. strength, and the alcohol determined . . . by Geissler's vaporimeter.
Ure, Dict., IV. 565.

vaporing, vapouring (vā'por-ing), n. [Verbal n. of vapor, v.] The act of bragging or blustering; ostentatious or windy talk.

Here, take thy satin pincushion, with thy curious half hundred of pins in 't, thou madest such a vapouring about yesterday.

Vanbrugh, The Mistake, iv. 1.

All these valorous vapourings had a considerable effect.

Iroing, Knickerbocker, p. 355.

The warnings were not less numerous; the vaporings of village bullies, the extravagances of excited secessionist politicians, even the drolling of practical jokers, were faithfully reported to him by zealous or nervous friends.

The Century, XXXIX. 431.

vaporing (vā'por-ing), p. a. Vaunting; swaggering; blustering; given to brag or bluster: as, vaporing talk; a vaporing debater.

vaporingly, vapouringly (vā'por-ing-li), adv. In a vaporing or blustering manner; boastfully.

The Corporal . . . gave a slight flourish with his stick—but not vapouringly.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix. 3.

vapor-inhaler (vā'por-in-hā'lēr), n. An apparatus for administering medicinal or anesthetic vapors.

vaporisable, vaporisation, etc. See vaporizable, etc.

vaporish, vapourish (vā'por-ish), a. [< vapor + -ish.] 1. Abounding in vapors; vaporous in a physical sense: as, a vaporish cave.

It proceeded from the nature of the vaporish place.

Sandys.

2. Affected by vapors; hypochondriac; dejected; splenetic; whimsical; hysterical.

A man had better be plagued with all the curses of Egypt than with a vaporish wife.

Fielding, Amelia, iii. 7.

Nor to be fretful, vaporish, or give way
To spleen and anger, as the wealthy may.

Crabbe, Works, VII. 63.

vaporishness, vapourishness (vā'por-ish-ness), n. The state or character of being vaporish or melancholy; hypochondria; spleen; the vapors.

You will not wonder that the vaporishness which has laid hold of my heart should rise to my pen.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, II. xcvi.

vaporizable (vā'por-i-zā-bl), a. [< vaporize + -able.] Capable of being vaporized or converted into vapor. Also spelled vaporisable.

vaporization (vā'por-i-zā'shōn), n. [= F. vaporisation = Sp. vaporización; as vaporize + -ation.] The act or process of vaporizing; the artificial formation of vapor, or the state of being converted into vapor; treatment with vapor. Also spelled vaporisation.

All matter, even the most solid, he [Zöllner] says, must slowly suffer volatilization if its temperature is above the absolute null point. This he illustrates by the vaporization of ice and the smell of metals and minerals.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 131.

vaporize (vā'por-iz), v.; pret. and pp. vaporized, ppr. vaporizing. [= F. vaporiser = Sp. vaporizar; as vapor + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To convert into vapor by the application of heat or by artificial means; cause to evaporate; sublimate.

The energy of our rivers and streams comes from the sun, too—for its heat vaporizes the water of the ocean, and makes the winds which carry it over the land, where it falls as rain, and, flowing to the ocean again, runs our mills and factories.

Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXX. 89.

The World lay still, suffused with a jewel-light, as of vaporized sapphire.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 757.

2. To affect with the vapors; render splenetic or hypochondriacal.

As vaporized ladies . . . run from spa to spa.

Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 358.

II. intrans. To pass off in vapor: as, sulphur or mercury vaporizes under certain conditions.

Iodine, allowed to vaporize at the temperature of boiling sulphur in presence of a large excess of air, showed no sign of dissociation.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XLI. 323.

Also spelled vaporise.

vaporizer (vā'por-i-zēr), n. [< vaporize + -er.] One who or that which vaporizes or converts into vapor; a form of atomizer. Also spelled vaporiser.

Take a vaporiser, and let the same be kept well at work with Mentholised Water night and day.

Lancet, No. 3463, p. 25 of adv'ts.

vaporizing-stove (vā'por-i-zīng-stōv), n. A form of heater for supplying steam to the air of a greenhouse. It consists, usually, of a pan for water placed over a lamp.

vapor-lamp (vā'por-lamp), n. A vapor-burner, or a lamp constructed on the principle of the vapor-burner.

vaporole (vā'pō-rōl), n. [< vapor + -ole.] A small thin glass capsule, containing a definite ity, though intrinsic, is called into play by the extrinsic conditions under which organisms vary, and in this way is counteractive of heredity, or the tendency to breed true. (See atavism and selection, 3.) The old notion of species as special creations, and as among the "constants of nature," subject to variation within very narrow limits which are themselves fixed in every case, finds no place in modern biological conceptions. (See species, 5.) The actual extent of variation which results from variability has been realized in all its significance only within the past thirty years, during which observations in every branch of natural history have demonstrated the universality of the fact, and shown the average rate or degree of variability to be much greater than had before been suspected. The cases of domestic animals and plants, first systematically studied by Darwin with special reference to variability, proved to be much less exceptional than they had been assumed to be; and the results of extending the same researches to the variability of organisms in a state of nature may be said to have entirely remodeled biology. See Darwinism and evolution, 2 (a), (b).

We see indefinite variability in the endless slight peculiarities which distinguish the individuals of the same species, and which cannot be accounted for by inheritance from either parent or from some more remote ancestor.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 23.

3. In astron., the fact that a star or nebula changes its brightness in a more or less periodic manner.—Generative variability, in biol., inherited variability; inherent tendency to vary away from ancestral characters, and thus not to revert or exhibit atavism. See the quotation.

It is only in those cases in which the modification has been comparatively recent and extraordinarily great that we ought to find the generative variability, as it may be called, still present in a high degree. For in this case the variability will seldom as yet have been fixed by the continued selection of the individuals varying in the required manner and degree, and by the continued rejection of those tending to revert to a former or less-modified condition.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 154.

variable (vā'ri-ā-bl), a. and n. [F. variable = Sp. variable = Pg. variavel = It. variabile, < LL. variabilis, changeable, < L. variare, change; see vary.] I. a. 1. Apt to change; changing; or altering in a physical sense; liable to change; changeable.

Certeine carpettes, coucouillettes, table clothes and hangings made of gossamerlike silke fynely wrought after a strange manyr with plesante and variable colours.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 129].

Species are more or less variable under the influence of external conditions, and the varieties so formed may or may not be true species. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 134.

2. In bot. and zool., embracing many individuals and groups (varieties, subspecies, forms, states) which depart somewhat from the strict type: said of a species or, in a similar sense, of some particular character.—3. Liable to vary or change, in a moral sense; mutable; fickle; inconstant: as, variable moods.

O, swear not by the moon, the inconstant moon,
That monthly changes in her circled orb,
Least that thy love prove likewise variable.

Shak., R. and J., ii. 2. 111.

Lydington was sent to Leith, where he died, and was suspected to be poisoned; a Man of the greatest Understanding in the Scottish Nation, and of an excellent Wit, but very variable; for which George Buchanan called him the Chameleon.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 349.

4. Capable of being varied, altered, or changed; liable to change; alterable; in gram., capable of inflection.

I am sure he [Milton] would have stared if told that the "number of accents" in a pentameter verse was variable.

Lovell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 297.

5. In math., quantitatively indeterminate, and considered with reference to the various determinations of quantity that are possible in the case. See II.

A quantity is said to be unrestrictedly variable in a region when it can assume all numerical values in this region.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 70.

6. In astron., changing in brightness.—Variable cut-off, in engines, valve-gear so arranged as to cut off the steam or other elastic fluid from its cylinder at any determined point in the stroke of the piston, thus allowing the remaining effort to be accomplished by expansion of that supplied at the first part of the stroke. See cut-off.—Variable gear, in mech., a form of geared wheels designed to impart alternating changes in the speed of any machine, as a slow advance and quick return in reciprocating movements. Such gears are made in the form of sectors of different radius, which are brought into action alternately as the gears revolve. Another form of variable-speed mechanism employs geared wheels of different diameters, with a broad drum for a belt, the drum being divided into different sections, and each section connected by a separate shaft or sleeve with one of the gears. By shifting the belt to different sections of the drum, variations in the speed are obtained. In other forms of variable-speed mechanism, cones and disks are used in frictional contact, the variations being obtained by changing the point of contact of the two cones or disks; the common case-pulley is also a form of variable-speed mechanism. See pulley.—Variable motion, in mech., motion which is produced by the action of a force which varies in intensity.—Variable screw. See screw.

Variable Gear.

—Variable species, in biol., any species whose variations are notably numerous or marked, or whose rate of variability is decidedly above the average. (See def. 2.) All species are variable, and incessantly varying; but some show less fixity of characters than others, or are just now undergoing much modification, or happen to be among those of which we possess many specimens illustrating marked departures from the assumed type-form, as subspecies, varieties, etc.; and such are the variable species of the naturalists' every-day language, so called by way of emphasis, not of strict definition. See, for example, strawberry.—Variable-speed pulleys, an arrangement of pulleys and gears to produce changing speeds; variable-speed wheels.—Variable-speed wheels, wheels combined to transmit variable motion; variable-speed pulleys.—Variable star, in astron., a star which undergoes a periodical increase and diminution of its luster. = Syn. 1 and 3. Wavering, unstable, vacillating, fluctuating, fitful.

II. n. 1. That which is variable; that which varies, or is subject or liable to vary or change.

There are many variables among the conditions which conspire for the production of a good photograph.

J. N. Lockyer.

2. In math., a quantity which is indeterminate, and is considered with reference to its different possible values; originally, a quantity capable of values continuously connected in one dimension, so that it could be conceived as running through them all in the course of time. This meaning still remains; but we now speak of the position of a point as variable in two or three dimensions, and we also speak of the arguments of functions in the calculus of finite differences, where there is no approach to continuity, as variables. The difference between an indeterminate constant and a variable is frequently a mere difference of designation; but constants, though indeterminate, are not usually considered with reference to the different values which they may take. Mathematically there is very little (and no precise) difference between a variable and an unknown.

3. A shifting wind, as opposed to a trade-wind; hence, the variables, the intermediate region or belt between the northeast and the southeast trade-winds. The region varies in width from about 150 to 500 miles, and is characterized by calms, shifting breezes, and sometimes violent squalls, the laws of which are not so readily understood as are those of the trade-winds. The name is also generally given to those parts of the ocean where variable winds may be expected.

We find uniform trade-winds on each side the equator, almost uniting near it, and without a space of continuous "rains"—a limited interval only of variables and calms being found, during about ten months of the year.

Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 125.

Complex variable. See complex.—Dependent variable, any variable not the independent one.—Independent variable, in the calculus, the variable with reference to which the differentiations are performed; the variable to which the differentiations refer; also, the variable which is considered first, or as the parameter for the others. In any problem which may be proposed, it is a mere matter of convenience what variable shall be taken as the independent one; but after the equation is constructed the matter is in many cases determinate. In partial differential equations, equations of surfaces, etc., there are two or more independent variables.

variableness (vā'ri-ā-bl-nes), n. The state or character of being variable. (a) In a physical sense, susceptibility of change; lability or aptness to alter or to be altered; changeableness; variability; as, the variableness of the weather. (b) In a moral sense, mutability; inconstancy; unsteadiness; fickleness; levity; as, the variableness of human emotions.

The Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning [with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning, R. V.] Jas. 1. 17.

variably (vā'ri-ā-bli), adv. In a variable manner; changeably; inconstantly; unsteadily.

variance (vā'ri-āns), n. [ME. variance, variance, < *OF. *variance* = It. varianza, < L. variantia, a difference, diversity, < varian(t)-s, variant; see variant.] 1. The state of being or the act of becoming variant; alteration; variation; change; difference.

Without change or variance.

Rom. of the Rose, I. 5438.

2. In law, a discrepancy: (a) Between pleadings and proof, as where a complaint mentions a wrong date, or the facts prove to be different from what was alleged. (b) Between the form of the writ or process by which the action was commenced and the form of the declaration or complaint. Formerly, when variances were deemed more important than now, variance was often defined as a fatal discrepancy or disagreement, etc.; but in civil cases such variances between pleading and proof as do not actually mislead the adverse party are now disregarded as immaterial, and many others are amendable. Under what is known in the United States as the Code Practice, variance is used to designate a discrepancy in some particulars only, and is amendable if it has not misled, while a failure of proof as to the entire scope and meaning of an allegation is not regarded as a mere variance, but fatal.

3. Difference that produces disagreement or controversy; dispute; dissension; discord.

A sort of poor souls met, God's fools, good master,
Have had some little variance amongst ourselves.

Fletcher, Beggars' Bush, il. 1.

Even among the zealous patrons of a council of state, the most irreconcilable variance is discovered concerning the mode in which it ought to be constituted.

Madison, Federalist, No. 38.

4†. Variableness; inconstancy.

She is Fortune verely,
In whom no man shulde affye,
Nor in hir yettis have fiance,
She is so full of variance.

Rom. of the Rose, I. 5482.

At variance. (a) In a state of difference or disagreement.

She runs, but hopes she does not run unseen,
While a kind glance at her pursuer flies.
How much at variance are her feet and eyes!

Pope, Spring, I. 60.

In proportion as men are habituated to maintain their own claims while respecting the claims of others . . . is produced a mental attitude at variance with that which accompanies subjection. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 462.

(b) In a state of controversy or dissension; in a state of opposition or enmity.

I am come to set a man at variance against his father.
Mat. x. 35.

The Spaniards set York and Stanley at variance; they poison York, and seize upon his Goods.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 373.

= Syn. 1 and 3. Disagreement, etc. See difference.
variant (vā'ri-ant), a. and n. [ME. variant, variant, < OF. variant, F. variant = Sp. Pg. It. variante, < L. varian(t)-s, ppr. of varare, change, vary; see vary.] I. a. 1. Different; diverse; having a different form or character: as, a variant form or spelling of a word.

He [Hooper] adopted them [Forty-two Articles] so far as he liked, in his own visitation Articles, anticipating their publication by two years; and this diocesan variant edition, so to call it, is of value as giving the mind of the father of Nonconformity, or at least the most eminent puritan contemporary, on several important points.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xx., note.

2. Variable; varying; changing; inconstant.

So variant of diversitee
That men in everiche myghte se
Bothe gret ay and ek swetnesse.

Rom. of the Rose, I. 1917.

While above in the variant breezes
Numberless noisy weathercocks rattled and sang of mutation.

Longfellow, Evangeline, l. 1.

3†. Unsettled; restless.

He is heer and ther;
He is so variant, he abyt nowher.

Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 164.

II. n. Something that is substantially the same, though in a different form; in etym., a variant form or spelling of the same original word; in lit., a different reading or spelling.

These stories [French Folk-lore] are . . . interesting variants of those common to the rest of Europe.

N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 519.

It may be objected that some of these [local circumstances] are the characteristics of a variant rather than of a "version."

N. and Q., 7th ser., XI. 70.

variate (vā'ri-āt), v.; pret. and pp. variated, ppr. variating. [L. variatus, pp. of variare, change, vary; see vary.] I. trans. To make different; vary; diversify.

What was the cause of their multiplied, varied complotments against her?

Dean King, Sermon on the Fifth of November, 1608, p. 33. [Latham.]

II. intrans. To alter; vary; change.

That which we touch with times doth variate,
Now hot, now cold, and sometimes temperate.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

This artificial change is but a fixation of nature's inconstancy, helping its varying infirmities.

Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 43. [Latham.]

variate (vā'ri-āt), v. [ME. variate, < L. variatus, pp. see the verb.] Varied; variegated; diverse.

Olyve is pulde of colour variate.

variated<sup>2</sup>, a. Same as varriated.

Smooth, variated, unangular bodies.

Burke, Sublime and Beautiful. [Richardson.]

variation (vā'ri-ā-shən), n. [Early mod. E. also variacyon, < ME. variacyon, < OF. (and F.) variacion = Sp. variacion = Pg. variacão = It. variazione, < L. variatio(n)-s, a difference, variation, < variare, pp. variatus, change, vary; see vary.] 1. The act or process of varying; partial change in form, position, state, or qualities; alteration; mutation; diversity; variance; modification: as, variations of color; the slow variation of language.

After much variation of opinions, the prisoner at the bar was acquit of treason.

Sir J. Hayward, Life and Reign of Edw. VI., p. 322.

 2. Varicella (var-i-sel'jā), n. [< varicella + -ia].

9. Varicella (var-i-sel'jā), n. [< varicella + -ia].
 10. In the calculus, an infinitesimal increment of a function, due to changes in the values of the constants, and affecting it, therefore, in different amounts for different values of the variables. — 11. In calc.: (a) The following of a + sign after a — sign, or vice versa, in a row of signs. (b) A linear arrangement of some of a given set of objects or of all. Thus, there are fifteen variations of the letters A, B, C, as follows: A, B, C, AB, BA, BC, CB, CA, AC, ACB, BCA, CAB, CBA, BAC, ABC. — Analogous variation, in bot., a variation occurring in a species or variety which resembles a normal character in another and distinct species or variety; a parallel variation. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants.
 Correlated variation, in bot., a variation in any part of an organism which is correlated with and consequent upon the variation of another part of the same organism. The idea is that the whole organization of any individual is so bound together during its growth and development that when slight variations in any one part occur, and are accumulated through natural selection, other parts become modified. Darwin, Orig. of Species, p. 146. — Function of limited variation. See function. — Method of concomitant variations. See method. — Method or calculus of variations, a branch of the differential calculus established by the Bernoullis, Euler, and Lagrange, the object of which is to solve certain problems, called problems of maxima and minima, in which one curve, surface, etc., is compared with another in regard to certain conditions. For example, the earliest problem of the calculus of variations was that of the brachistochrone. Given two points A and B, to find the curve along which a particle will fall in least time from A to B. A variation is denoted by a lower-case Greek delta. — Movements of variation, in physiol., movements exhibited by mobile organs in plants, generally occurring in response to an external stimulation, as in the sensitive plant. — Parallel variation, in bot., same as analogous variation. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants. — Right of variation, in canon law, the right of a lay patron during an established period to suggest, for confirmation by the proper ecclesiastical authority, the diversion of a benefice already presented to a different candidate. A right of variation by which the ecclesiastical having the appointing power is obliged to appoint the second candidate presented is called privative; and the right of presentation by which he may appoint at his own discretion either of the candidates presented is called concomitant. See Metzger and Strong. — Variation of parameters, a change in an equation by which some of its constants are made functions of the variables. The application of this device to the solution of differential equations is called the method of the variation of parameters. — Variation of the elements, a method for the solution of a dynamical problem which differs only slightly from another whose solution is known. — Variation of the moon, an inequality in the moon's rate of motion, occasioned by the attraction of the sun, and depending as to its degree on the moon's position in her orbit, consisting in an acceleration in longitude from the quadratures to the syzygies, and a retardation from the syzygies to the quadratures. It was discovered by Tycho Brahe (1546-1601). — Variation-permanence. See Newton's rule, under rule. — Variations of state, in engraving, the results of all changes made on a plate by cutting, retouching, erasing inscriptions and substituting others, altering publisher's address, methods of printing, etc., according to which, in important engravings, the impressions are classified.

variational (var-i-a'shon-al), a. [< variation + -al]. Of or pertaining to variation, especially in its biological senses: as, a variational fact or doctrine; variational characters: in the latter instance, synonymous with varietal. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 77.
 variation-chart (vā-rī-ā'shon-chärt), n. A chart on which lines, called isogonic lines, are drawn passing through places having the same magnetic variation. See entry under isogonic.
 variation-compass (vā-rī-ā'shon-kum'pas), n. A declination compass.
 variator (vā-rī-ā-tor), n. A joint used in underground electrical mains to allow for the expansion or contraction of the metal with changes of temperature.
 varicated (var-i-kat-ed), a. [< NL. varix (varic-), a varix, + -at- + -ed]. In conch., having varices: marked by varicose formations.
 varication (var-i-kā'shon), n. [< NL. varix (varic-), + -ation]. In conch., formation of a varix: a set of system of varices. varicella (var-i-sel'jā), n. [= F. varicelle, < NL. varicella (varicellus) + dim. -ella]. A specific contagious disease, usually of childhood, characterized by an eruption of vesicles of moderate size, filled with a clear, slightly yellowish fluid; chicken-pox; swine-pox. There is usually but little if any fever or other constitutional disturbance. Rarely one or more of the vesicles will leave a slight pit in the skin resembling a smallpox-scar. The disease is very mild, and is seldom or never fatal. — Varicella gangrenosa, a rare form of chicken-pox in which the eruption terminates in gangrenous ulceration.

varicellar (var-i-sel'jār), a. [< varicella + -ar]. Of or relating to varicella. — Varicellar fever. (a) The initial fever of chicken-pox. (b) Modified smallpox; varioloid. (Rare and erroneous.)

varicellate (var-i-sel'āt), a. [< varicella + -at]. In conch., having small varices.

varicelloid (var-i-sel'oid), a. [< varicella + -oid]. Resembling varicella. — Varicelloid smallpox, modified smallpox; varioloid.

varices, n. Plural of varix.

variciform (var-i-si-fōrm), a. [< L. varix, a dilated vein, + forma, form: see form]. Resembling a varix; varicose; knotty.

varicoblepharon (var'i-kō-blef'a-ron), n. [NL., < L. varix (varic-), a dilated vein, + Gr. βλεφαρον, eyelid]. A varicose tumor of the eyelid.

varicocele (var'i-kō-sēl), n. [= F. varicocèle, < L. varix, a dilated vein, + Gr. κήλη, a tumor]. A tumor in the scrotum, composed of the varicose veins of the spermatic cord. The term was employed by the older medical writers to designate also a varicose condition of the scrotal veins.

varicoid (var'i-koid), a. [< L. varix, a dilated vein, + -oid]. Same as variciform.

varicolored, varicoloured (vā-rī-kul-ord), a. [< L. varius, various, + color, color, + -ed]. Diversified in color; variegated; motley.

Vary-colour'd shells. Tenison, Arabian Nights.

varicolorous (vā-rī-kul'gr-us), a. [< L. varius, various, + color, color, + -ous]. Variously colored; variegated in color.

varicorn (vā-rī-kōrn), a. and n. [< L. varius, various, + cornu = E. horn]. I. a. Having diversiform or variously shaped antennæ; of or pertaining to the Varicornes. II. n. A varicorn beetle.

Varicornes (vā-rī-kōr'nēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. varius, various, + cornu = E. horn]. In some systems, a legion of Coleoptera, including the clavicornes, lamellicornes, and sericornes. [Rare.]

varicose (var'i-kōs), a. [< L. varicosus, full of dilated veins, < varix (varic-), a dilated vein: see varix]. 1. Of or relating to varix; affected with varix.

I observed that nearly all of them [bearers] had large varicose veins in their legs, owing to the severity of their avocation. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II, 91.

The skin covering the morbid growth was rough, and showed large blue varicose veins ramifying over the surface. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 79.

2. Designed for the cure or relief of varicose veins: applied to elastic fabrics made into stockings, bandages, etc., used for this purpose. — 3. In zool., prominent and tortuous, as formations upon a shell; resembling or having varices; varicated. — Varicose aneurism, an aneurismal sac having communication with both an artery and a vein. See aneurismal varix, under aneurismal. — Varicose angioma, dilatation of the minute veins or venous radicles. — Varicose lymphatics, dilated lymphatic vessels. — Varicose ulcer, an ulcer of the leg caused by the presence of varicose veins. — Varicose veins, a condition in which the superficial veins, usually of the lower extremity, are dilated, the valves giving them a beaded appearance.

varicosed (var'i-kōst), a. [< varicose + -ed]. In a condition of varix: noting veins.

varicosity (var-i-kos'i-ti), n.; pl. varicosities (-tiz). [< varicose + -ity]. A varix.

varicous (var'i-kus), a. [< L. varicosus, varicose: see varicose]. Same as varicose.

varicula (vā-rik'ū-lā), n.; pl. variculæ (-lē). [NL., < L. varicula, dim. of varix (varic-), a dilated vein: see varix]. A varix of the conjunctiva.

varied (vā'rid), p. a. 1. Altered; partially changed; changed.

These, as they change, Almighty Father, these Are but the varied God. Thomson, Hymn.

2. Characterized by variety: consisting of various kinds or sorts: as, a varied assortment of goods. — 3. Differing from one another; diverse; various: as, commerce with its varied interests. — 4. Variegated in color: as, the varied thrush. — Varied pickerel, shrike, thrush. See the nouns.

variedly (vā'rid-li), adv. Diversely.

Variegatæ (vā'ri-e-gā'tē), n. pl. [NL. (Guenée, 1852), fem. pl. of LL. variegatus: see variegata.] An important group of noctuid moths, belonging to the division Quadrifidae, and including eight of Guenée's families, the most important being the Plusiidae. They have the body small or of moderate size, the proboscis long or moderate, palpi well developed, the fore wings metallic or with a silky luster, or with the inner border angular or denticulate, and the hind wings of one color, occasionally pale or yellow with a dark border. See cut under Plusia.

variegata (vā'ri-e-gat'), v. t.; pret. and pp. variegated, ppr. variegating. [= Sp. Pg. variegado, < LL. variegatus, pp. of variegare, make of various sorts or colors, < L. varius, various (see various), + agere, make, do.] To diversify by means of different tints or hues; mark with different colors in irregular patches; spot, streak, dapple, etc.: as, to variegata a floor with marble of different colors.

Each particular thing is variegated, or wears a mottled coat.

Bacon, Fable of Pan.

variegated (vā'ri-e-gā-ted), p. a. Varied in color; irregularly marked with different colors.—Variegated copper. Same as boratite.—Variegated monkey, the douc, Simopithecus nematus.—Variegated pebbleware. See pebbleware.—Variegated sandstone. Same as New Red Sandstone (which see, under sandstone).—Variegated sheldrake, Tadorna variegata.—Variegated sole. See sole.—Variegated spider-monkey, Ateles variegatus.—Variegated tanager, thrush, etc. See the nouns.

variegation (vā'ri-e-gā'shon), n. [= Pg. variegado, as variegata + -ion.] 1. Varied coloration; the conjunction of various colors or color-marks; party-coloration.—2. In bot.: (a) The conjunction of two or more colors in the petals, leaves, and other parts of plants. (b) A condition of plants in which the leaves become partially white or of a very light color, from suppression or modification of the chlorophyll. Plants showing this unnatural condition may be otherwise quite healthy, and are often prized on account of their peculiar appearance. The cause is not well known. It sometimes occurs in a single branch of a tree, and may be thence propagated by grafting. As a permanent and often congenital peculiarity it is to be distinguished from chlorosis (which compare).

variegator (vā'ri-e-gā-tor), n. [< variegata + -or.] One who or that which variegates.

varier (vā'ri-ēr), n. [< vary + -er.] One who varies; one who deviates.

Pious variers from the church. Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

varietal (vā'ri-e-tal), a. [< variet-y + -al.] In biol., having the character of a zoological or botanical variety; subspecific, or of the character of a subspecies; racial, with reference to geographical variation; of or pertaining to varieties; variational: as, varietal characters; varietal differences or distinctions. See variability, 2, variation, 8, and variety, 6.

varietally (vā'ri-e-tal-i), adv. In biol., in a varietal manner or relation; as a variety; to a varietal extent only; subspecifically. J. W. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 174.

variety (vā'ri-e-ti), n.; pl. varieties (-tiz). [Early mod. E. also varietie, variete; < OF. variete, F. variété = Sp. variedad = Pg. variedade = It. varietà, < L. varieta (-t-), difference, diversity, < varius, different, various: see various.] 1. The state or character of being varied or various; intermixture of different things, or of things different in form, or a succession of different things; diversity; multifariousness; absence of monotony or uniformity; dissimilitude.

Their Oathes (especially of their Emperors) are of many cuts, and varietie of fashion.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 295.

Variety I ask not; give me One

To live perpetually upon.

Cowley, The Mistress, Resolved to be Beloved, i.

Variety's the very spice of life,

That gives it all its flavor.

Cowper, Task, ii. 606.

2. Exhibition of different characteristics by one individual; many-sidedness; versatility.

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety; other women cloy
The appetites they feed. Shak. A. and C., ii. 2. 241.

3†. Variation; deviation; change.

Hee also declared certeyne thynges as concerninge the variete of the northe pole.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 90].

Immovable, no way obnoxious to varietie or change.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 95.

4. A collection of different things; a varied assortment.

Two Crucifixes of inestimable worth, beset with wonderful variety of precious stones, as Carbuncles, Rubies, Diamonds.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 45.

5. Something differing from others of the same general kind; one of many things which agree in their general features; a sort; a kind: as, varieties of rock, of wood, of land, of soil; to prefer one variety of cloth to another.—6. In biol., with special reference to classification: (a) A subspecies; a subdivision of a species; an individual animal or plant which differs, or collectively those individuals which differ, from the rest of its or their species, in certain recognizable particulars which are transmissible, and constant to a degree, yet which are not specifically distinctive, since they intergrade with the characters of other members of the same species; a race, especially a climatic or geographical race which arises without man's interference. See species, 5. As the biological conception of species excludes the notion of special creation, or of any original fixation of specific distinctions, so the same conception regards varieties as simply nascent species which may or may not be established; if established, varieties have become species in the process, as soon as the steps of that process are obliterated. A variety has in itself the making of a species, and all species are supposed to have thus been made. The distinction being always in degree only, and never in kind, the actual recognition of both varieties and species for the purposes of classification, nomenclature, and description is largely a matter of fact and experience. See eclecticism. (b) A race, as of cultivated plants or domestic animals; a stock; a strain; a sport; a breed: a general term, covering all the modifications which may be impressed upon animals and plants by artificial selection. See the more distinctive words, especially race, n., 5 (b). Varieties of this grade seldom reach the permanence of those attributed to natural selection, and tend to revert if left to themselves, though the actual differences may be greater than those marking natural varieties. (See Dysodius.) In like manner the term variety is applied to inorganic substances of the same kind which are susceptible of classification, to note differences in color, structure, crystallization, and the like, all the varieties being referable to some one species which is assumed as the typically perfect standard: as, varieties of quartz or of diamond. See subspecies.—Climatic variety, a natural variety of any species produced by climatic influences, or specially affected by such influences, or regarded with particular reference to climate. As climate itself is largely a matter of geography, a climatic variety is almost necessarily a geographical variety, and the terms are interchangeable. See below.—Geographical variety, a natural variety of any species whose range of distribution is coincident with a given geographical region, and whose varietal peculiarities have been caused by, or are dependent for their perpetuity upon, local influences, especially climate; a climatic variety; a local race. Animals and plants which have a wide geographical distribution are almost always found to run into geographical races, which may be so strongly marked that there is great difference of opinion among naturalists respecting their full specific or only varietal valuation. The principal exceptions are in those forms whose individuals may be wide-ranging, through unusual powers of locomotion, as those birds which perform extensive annual migrations, and are therefore not continually subjected to modifying local influences. Geographical variation, under any given degree of climatic difference, is strongly favored by insulation, or anything which tends to a sort of natural in-and-in breeding of comparatively few individuals, as is well illustrated in the fauna and flora of islands, where geographical varieties tend to develop speedily into species distinct from those of neighboring islands. Mountain-ranges and desert areas always develop a fauna and flora of a facies peculiar to themselves. The main climatic factors in the evolution of geographical varieties are relative temperature and relative humidity.—Variety hybrid, a mongrel resulting from crossing individuals of opposite sexes of different varieties of the same species. They are much more numerous than hybrids between different species, and are usually very easy to bring about with proper selection of the stocks from which to breed. They are also usually fertile, which as a rule is not the case with the progeny of thoroughly distinct species.

variety-planer (vā'ri-e-ti-plā'nēr), n. See molding-machine, 1.

variety-show (vā'ri-e-ti-shō), n. An entertainment consisting of dances, songs, negro-minstrelsy, gymnastics, or specialties of any kind, sometimes including farces or short sketches written to exhibit the accomplishments of the company.

variety-theater (vā'ri-e-ti-thē'a-tēr), n. A theater devoted to variety-shows.

variform (vā'ri-fōrm), a. [= It. variforme, < L. varius, various, + forma, form.] Varied in form; having different shapes; diversified.

variformed (vā'ri-fōrmed), a. [< variform + -ed.] Same as variform.

varify (vā'ri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. varified, ppr. varifying. [< L. varius, various, + ficare, < facere, make, do (see -fy).] To diversify; variegate; color variously. [Rare.]

May is seen,
Suiting the Lawns in all her pomp and pride
Of lively Colours, lovely varified.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

variola (vā'ri-ō-lā), n. [= F. variole = Sp. viruela, < ML. variola, also variolus, smallpox, < L.

varius, various, spotted: see various.] 1. Smallpox; a specific contagious disease characterized by an eruption of papules, becoming vesicular and then pustular, and attended by high fever, racking pains in the head and spine, and severe constitutional disturbance. The eruption in its vesicular stage is umbilicated, and it is apt to leave a number of roundish depressed scars, the pits or pock-marks. See smallpox.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Swainson, 1839).] A genus of fishes.—Variola confuens, discreta, hemorrhagica. Same as confuent, discrete, hemorrhagic smallpox. See smallpox.—Variola inserta, a smallpox produced by inoculation.—Variola ovina, sheep-pox.

variolar (vā'ri-ō-lār), a. [< variola + -ar.] Same as variolous.

Variolaria (vā'ri-ō-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL., so called because the shields of these plants resemble the eruptive spots of smallpox; < ML. variola, smallpox: see variola.] An old pseudogenus of lichens, the species of which are variously disposed.

variolarine (vā'ri-ō-lā'rin), a. [< Variolaria + -ine.] In bot., of or pertaining to the genus Variolaria; pustulate.

variolaroid (vā'ri-ō-lā'ri-oid), a. [< Variolaria + -oid.] In bot., resembling or pertaining to the genus Variolaria.

variolate (vā'ri-ō-lāt), a. [< ML. variola + -at.] 1. In entom., resembling a scar of smallpox: noting impressions or foveæ when they have a central prominence.—2. In bot., thickly marked with pustules or pits, as in smallpox.

variolated (vā'ri-ō-lāt-ed), a. [< variolate + -ed.] Inoculated with the virus of smallpox.

variolation (vā'ri-ō-lā'shon), n. [< variola + -ation.] Inoculation with the virus of smallpox. See inoculation, 2. Also variologization.—Bovine variolation, inoculation of a cow with the virus of smallpox, for the purpose of obtaining vaccine virus from the eruption resulting.

variole (vā'ri-ōl), n. [< F. variole, < ML. variola, smallpox: see variola.] 1. In zool., a shallow pit, or slightly pitted marking, like the pitting of a smallpox-pustule; a foveole.—2. In lithol., a spherulite of the rock called variolite.

The spherulites or varioles [of the variolite-diabase from the Durance] are grouped or drawn out in bands parallel to the surface, being in some places almost microscopic, in others 5 centim. in diameter.

Cole and Gregory, Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 312.

variolic (vā'ri-ōl'ik), a. [= F. varioliqne; as variola + -ic.] Variolous.

variolite (vā'ri-ō-lit), n. [< variola + -ite.] A rock in which there is a more or less distinctly concretionary arrangement, giving rise to pustular or pea-like forms which are disseminated through a finely crystalline ground-mass, and which, from their resemblance as seen on weathered surfaces to smallpox-pustules, have for hundreds of years made this rock an object of curiosity. In India variolite has been held in high respect as a preventive of or cure for smallpox, being worn as an amulet suspended from the neck, or used in other similar ways. The name by which it has been known there is gamaica. From the time of Aldrovandi till now, variolite has occupied the attention of geologists and lithologists. The best-known locality, by far, of this curious rock is the region of the river Durance, near the border of France and Italy. A rock very similar in character to the variolite of the Durance is found in the district of Olonetz in Russia. Variolite is now most generally regarded as a product of contact-metamorphism. The varioles or spherulites of this rock seem rather variable in composition, but chiefly made up of a triclinic feldspar. The Durance variolite is defined by its latest investigators (Messrs. Cole and Gregory) as being "a devitrified spherulitic tachylite, typically coarse in structure."

variolithic (vā'ri-ō-lit'ik), a. [< variolite + -ic.] In lithol., pertaining to, resembling, or containing variolite.

variolitism (vā'ri-ō-lit-izm), n. [< variolite + -ism.] A less correct form of variolitization.

Lowinson-Lessing seems inclined to abandon variolite as the name of a rock-species in favor of spherulitic agiteporphyrite, retaining it, however, in the form of variolitism for that of a process.

Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 330.

variolitization (vā'ri-ō-lit-i-zā'shon), n. [< variolite + -ize + -ation.] In lithol., conversion into variolite; change in a rock of such a character as to give rise to the peculiar structure denominated variolithic. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 330.

variologization (vā'ri-ō-l-i-zā'shon), n. [< variola + -ize + -ation.] Same as variolitization.

varioid (vā'ri-ō-lōid), a. and n. [= Sp. varioloide; < ML. variola, smallpox, + Gr. oides, form.] 1. a. 1. Resembling variola or smallpox.—2. Resembling measles; having the appearance of measles, as the skin of diseased pigs.

variegated (vā'ri-gē-tēd), a. [L. variegatus, variegated, also changed, variegatus, etc.] Hence alt. variegata, variegata, etc.] 1. Differing from uniformity; diversified; manifold; as, a variegated carpet. 2. Divers; several. 3. Changeable; uncertain; inconstant; variable; as, a variegated sky.

variegated (vā'ri-gē-tēd), a. [L. variegatus, variegated, also changed, variegatus, etc.] Hence alt. variegata, variegata, etc.] 1. Differing from uniformity; diversified; manifold; as, a variegated carpet. 2. Divers; several. 3. Changeable; uncertain; inconstant; variable; as, a variegated sky.

variegated (vā'ri-gē-tēd), a. [L. variegatus, variegated, also changed, variegatus, etc.] Hence alt. variegata, variegata, etc.] 1. Differing from uniformity; diversified; manifold; as, a variegated carpet. 2. Divers; several. 3. Changeable; uncertain; inconstant; variable; as, a variegated sky.

variegated (vā'ri-gē-tēd), a. [L. variegatus, variegated, also changed, variegatus, etc.] Hence alt. variegata, variegata, etc.] 1. Differing from uniformity; diversified; manifold; as, a variegated carpet. 2. Divers; several. 3. Changeable; uncertain; inconstant; variable; as, a variegated sky.

variegated (vā'ri-gē-tēd), a. [L. variegatus, variegated, also changed, variegatus, etc.] Hence alt. variegata, variegata, etc.] 1. varnish-tree (vā'nish-trē), n. Any one of several trees of which the sap or some secretion serves as a lacquer or varnish. The most important of these is the Japan varnish- or lacquer-tree (see lacquer-tree); also of high importance is the black, Burmese, or Martaban varnish-tree, Melanorrhoea usitata, the tree of the Burmese, a tree of 50 or 60 feet, yielding on fission a sap of an extremely blistering property which forms a lacquer of very extensive local use (see black varnish, under varnish). In India the marking-nut, or Sylihet varnish-tree, Semecarpus Anacardium, with one or two allied species, yields in its fruit an excellent black varnish, as does Heliconia bonellii in its bark. These all belong to the Anacardiaceae. See Hymenaea and Aleurites. False varnish-tree, the tree-of-heaven, Ailanthus glandulosa.—Moreton Bay varnish-tree. See Pentaceras.—New varnish, that makes ceilings not only shine, but last.

Bacon, Vain Glory (ed. 1887).

To Greatorex's, and there he showed me his varnish, which he hath invented, which appears every whit as good, upon a stick which he hath done, as the Indian.
Pepys, Diary, l. 424.

2. That which resembles varnish, either naturally or artificially; a glossy or lustrous appearance.

So doe I more the sacred Tongue esteem (Though plaine and rurall it do rather seem,
Then schoold Athenian; and Diuinitie,
For only varnish, haue but Verity).
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

varveled, varvelled (vär'veld), a. [< varvel + -ed.] In her., having the rings called varvels attached: said of the leg of a hawk when used as a bearing. Compare belled, and see cut under à la cuisse. Also verveled.

varvels (vär'velz), n. pl. [Also vervels; < OF. vervelles, F. vervelles, varvels for a hawk, prob. same as vervelles, vertevelles, the hinges of a gate, < ML. vertibella, a hinge, dim. of LL. vertibulum, a joint, ML. also a pair of tongs; cf. It. bertovello, a fish-net, also It. dial. bertavel, bertavelle, bertarel, a fish-net, bird-net, = OF. verveil, verveil, verveil, verveil, F. verveil (ML. vervillium), a fish-net, hoop-net; < L. vertere, turn: see verse<sup>1</sup>, vertebra.] In falconry, rings, usually of silver, placed on the legs of a hunting-hawk, on which the owner's name is engraved. See cut under à la cuisse.

vary (vä'ri), v.; pret. and pp. varied, ppr. varying. [< ME. varien, varyen, < OF. (and F.) varier = Sp. Pg. variar = It. variare, < L. variare, tr. change, alter, make different, intr. change, be different, vary, < varius, different, various: see various.] 1. To change; alter: as, to vary the conditions of an experiment.

It hath diuers times also happened that the appellation of some of these people haue come to be varied and changed. Verstegan, Rest. of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), p. 17.

2. To diversify; modify; relieve from uniformity or monotony.

Once more I'll mark how love can vary wit. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 100.

Varied his bounty so with new delights. Milton, P. L., v. 431.

3. To change to something else; transmute.

Gods, that never change their state, Vary oft their love and hate. Waller, To Phyllis.

We are to vary the customs according to the time and the country where the scene of action lies. Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

4. To make of different kinds; make diverse or different one from another.—5†. To express variously; diversify in terms or forms of expression.

The man hath no wit that cannot, from the rising of the lark to the lodging of the lamb, vary deserved praise on my palfrey. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 7. 35.

6. In music, to embellish or alter (a melody or theme) without really changing its identity. See variation, 9.

II. intrans. 1. To alter or be altered in any manner; suffer a partial change; appear in different or various forms; be modified; be changeable.

Fortune's mood Varies again. Shak., Pericles, iii., Prol.

Who can believe what varies every day, Nor ever was nor will be at a stay? Dryden, Hind and Panther, ii. 36.

2. To differ or be different; be unlike or diverse: as, the laws of different countries vary.

Zit alle it so be, that Men of Grece ben Cristene, zit they varien from oure Feithe. Mandeville, Travels, p. 18.

She that varies from me in belief Gives great presumption that she loves me not. Marlowe, Jew of Malta, iii. 4.

I have not been curious as to the spelling of the Names of Places, Plants, Fruits, Animals, &c., which in many of the remoter parts are given at the pleasure of Travellers, and vary according to their different Humours. Dampier, Voyages, I., Pref.

3. To become unlike one's self; undergo variation, as in purpose or opinion.

He would vary, and try both ways in turn. Bacon.

4. To deviate; depart; swerve.

Varying from the right rule of reason. Locke.

5. To alter or change in succession; follow alternately; alternate.

While fear and anger, with alternate grace, Pant in her breast, and vary in her face. Addison, Cato, iii. 7.

6. To disagree; be at variance.

In judgement of her substance thus they vary, And thus they vary in judgement of her seat; For some her chair up to the brain do carry, Some thrust it down into the stomach's heat. Sir J. Davies, Immortal, of Soul.

7†. To turn out otherwise.

Anhanged be swich on, were he my brother! And so he shal, for it ne may noight varyen. Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1621.

8. In math. analysis, to be subject to continual increase or decrease: as, a quantity conceived to vary, or have different values in the same equation. One quantity is said to vary directly as another when if the one is increased or diminished the other increases or diminishes in some definite proportion. Quantities vary inversely when if one is increased or diminished the other is proportionally diminished or increased.

9. In biol., to be varied or subject to variation, as by natural or artificial selection; exhibit variation. See variability, 2, variation, 8, and variety, 6.—Varying hare. See hare<sup>1</sup>, 1.

Reneg, affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks With every gale and vary of their masters. Shak., Lear, ii. 2. 85.

vary-colored (vä'ri-kul'örd), a. An erroneous spelling of varicolored.

vas (vas), n.; pl. vasa (vä'sä). [< L. vas, a vessel: see vase, vessel.] In anat. and zool., a vessel or vessel, as a tube, duct, or conduit conveying blood, lymph, or other fluid.—Vasa aberrantia. (a) Long slender arteries which occasionally connect the brachial or the axillary artery with one of the arteries of the forearm, usually the radial. (b) The aberrant ducts of the testis. See aberrant. (c) Bile-ducts running an unusual course in the liver.—Vasa afferentia, the afferent vessels of a lymphatic gland; the small branches into which a lymphatic or lacteal vessel divides before entering a gland.—Vasa ambulacralia cava, hollow ambulacral vessels; certain diverticula or caecal prolongations of the Polian vesicles and ambulacral ring in echinoderms.—Vasa brevia. (a) The gastric branches distributed to splenic artery: five to seven small branches distributed to the fundus and greater curvature of the stomach. (b) Tributaries to the splenic vein, corresponding to the arterial vasa brevia.—Vasa centralia, the central vessels (artery and vein) of the optic nerve.—Vasa chyliifera. Same as vasa lactea.—Vasa efferentia. (a) The efferent tubules of the testis: from twelve to twenty ducts which receive the seminal fluid from the vessels of the rete testis, and transmit it to the epididymis, forming in their course convoluted conical masses, the coni vasculosi, which together constitute the globus major. (b) The efferent lymphatic vessels: usually small ones, that soon unite into a larger one.—Vasa Graafiana. Same as vasa efferentia (a).—Vasa inferentia. Same as vasa afferentia.—Vasa intestinalia tenuis, from twelve to fifteen slender branches of the superior mesenteric artery, distributed to the jejunum and ileum.—Vasa lactea, the lacteals; the small chyliiferous vessels of the intestine.—Vasa lymphatica, lymphatic vessels. See cut under lymphatic.—Vasa recta, the straight tubules of the testis: from twenty to thirty short ducts formed by the union of the seminiferous tubules, and discharging into the vessels of the rete testis.—Vasa vasorum, small blood-vessels supplying the walls of other larger vessels.—Vasa vorticosa, the veins of the outer part of the choroid coat of the eye, which converge from all directions to form four or five principal trunks.—Vas deferens, the excretory duct of the testis, or its equivalent. In man it is a continuation of the epididymis, beginning at the lower part of the globus minor, and ascending with the spermatic cord through the inguinal ring to the base of the bladder, where it becomes enlarged and sacculated, and finally unites with the duct of the vesicula seminalis to form the ejaculatory duct. It is about two feet in length, being greatly convoluted, and an eighth of an inch in diameter. The duct which receives this name in various animals differs greatly in anatomical character. See cut under Trematoda, Asciacidae, and Germaurium.—Vas deferens mulieris, a Fallopian tube.—Vas prominens, the spirally running vessel in the accessory spiral ligament of the cochlea.—Vas spirale, a small blood-vessel of the cochlea, situated opposite the outer rods of Corti, on the under surface of the basilar membrane.

Vasa (vä'sä), n. In ornith., same as Vasa.

vasal (vä'säl), a. Pertaining to a vas or vessel; especially, pertaining to the blood-vessels. vasalium (vä-sä'li-um), n.; pl. vasalia (-ä). [NL.: see vas.] Vascular tissue proper; endothelium; colarium; the epithelium-like layer of cells or vascular carpet which lines the closed cavities of the body, such as the serous surfaces of the thorax, abdomen, and pericardium, and the interior of the heart, arteries, veins, and other vessels.

vascula, n. Plural of vasculum.

vascular (vas'kü-lär), a. [= F. vasculaire = Sp. Pg. vascular = It. vascolare, vascolare, < NL. **vascularis*, < L. vasculum, a small vessel: see vasculum.] 1. In anat. and zool.: (a) Of or pertaining to vessels which convey fluids; of or pertaining to the conveyance or circulation of fluids, especially blood, lymph, and chyle; circulatory: as, the vascular system; a vascular function or action. Some vascular systems are specified as blood-vascular, lymph-vascular, and water-vascular. See also chylotrans.

Remotely dependent, however, as the genesis of motion is on digestive, vascular, respiratory, and other structures, and immediately dependent as it is on contractile structures, its most important dependence remains to be named: . . . the initiator or primary generator of motion is the Nervous System. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 2.

The machinery of circulation is two sets of vessels—the hematic, or vascular system proper, consisting of the heart, arteries, veins, and capillaries for the blood-circulation; and the lymphatic, consisting of lymph-hearts and vessels, for the flow of lymph. . . . Those tissues whose capillaries are large enough for the passage of all the constituents of the blood are said to be vascular; those which only feed by sucking up certain constituents of the blood, and have no demonstrable capillaries, are called non-vascular. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 195.

(b) Containing vessels for the circulation of fluids; especially, well provided with small blood-vessels: as, muscle and bone are very vascular tissues; cartilage and cuticle are non-vascular; a vascular tumor.—2. In bot.: (a) Consisting of, relating to, or furnished with vessels or ducts: applied to the tissues of plants that are composed of or furnished with elongated cells or vessels for the circulation of sap. (b) Of or pertaining to the higher or phanerogamous plants, these uniformly containing more or less clearly defined vessels or ducts.—Vascular arches. See vascular arches, under vascular.—Vascular cake, the placenta. [Rare.]—Vascular centers, the centers in the medulla and spinal cord which are supposed to control dilatation and contraction of the blood-vessels.—Vascular cryptogams, cryptogams in which the tissues consist more or less of true vascular tissue. These are coextensive with the Pteridophyta, or so-called higher cryptogams.—Vascular ganglions or glands. See gland.—Vascular glomerulus. See glomerulus.—Vascular plants, plants in which the structure is made

The greatest period of the great art activity for ancient ceramics, from vases to 500 B. C. The greatest part of the Greek vases are in fine pottery, glazed, and decorated with monochrome and outline designs in simple pigments. They are notable not only for the great beauty and appropriateness of much of the decoration, but for the supreme elegance, unattained among other peoples, of a large proportion of the forms. Acoustic vase. See acoustic. — Alhambra vase. A large vase at the Alhambra near Granada which is a unique specimen of pottery, and the finest specimen known in the ware of Malaga. — Bacchic vase. See Bacchic. — Barbarini vase. Same as Portland vase. — Borghese vase. A large Greek-Roman vase of white marble with bas-relief representing the thiasus of Bacchus, preserved in the Louvre Museum. — Canopic vases. See Canopic. — Dionysiac vase. Same as Bacchic vase. — Encaustic vase. See encaustic. — Etruscan vases. A former mistaken name for Greek decorated pottery, due to the discovery in Etrurian tombs, in the seventeenth century and later, of the first examples of these vases to attract attention in modern times. — Mandarin vases. See mandarin.

Peg-top vase. See peg-top. — Pilgrim's vase. See pilgrim. — Portland vase, a remarkable example of Greek Roman cameo-glass with reliefs in opaque white glass upon a ground of dark blue, of somewhat doubtful subject, but interpreted as having reference to the myth of Peleus and Thetis. This vase, which is 9½ inches high, is preserved in the British Museum. Also called Thetis's vase. See cut in preceding column. — Profumiera vase, a vase for perfumes, arranged with openings in the cover through which the fragrance can issue.

— Temple vase. See temple. Triple vase, a group of three vases, united by bands of the same material, or by being in contact at the lips or otherwise. Such vases are often sharply pointed, so that one could not stand alone. Tripod vase. See tripod. Unguentary vase. See unguentary. Vase à jacinthe, an ornamental vase to which are attached upon its sides or cover receptacles for bulbs of a flowering plant, as the hyacinth, the spikes of the flowers seeming to form part of the design of the vase.— Vase of a theater, in anc. arch., same as acoustic vase.— Vase of Mithridates, of Ptolemy, or of St. Denis, a vase of agate with carved ornament of Bacchic character, preserved in the treasury of the Abbey of St. Denis, to which it was presented by Charolman. It was brought from Italy by Charlemagne, and according to tradition belonged to Ptolemy XI., the father of Cleopatra, and to Mithridates, king of Pontus.

vase-clock (väs'klok), n. A timepiece having the general form of a vase. In the eighteenth century some clocks were made which told the time by means of two rings, set one upon another and revolving at different rates of speed, the one for the hours, the other for the minutes. Such rings were combined with the body of a vase, so as to form part of its decoration.

vaseful (vās'fŭl), n. [< vase + -ful.] The quantity that a vase will contain.

This [prostration] was followed by a cup of holy water and a present to the Sakkas, or carriers, who for the consideration distributed a large earthen vaseful in my name to poor pilgrims. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 391.

vaseline (vas'e-lin), n. [So named by the proprietor of the article; irreg. < G. was(ser), water, + Gr. iz (aur), oil, + -ine<sup>2</sup>.] Same as petrolatum. It is a semi-fluid, viscid, nearly colorless, bland, and neutral material, and is used in medicine and surgery as a vehicle.

vase-painting (vās'pān'ting). n. The decoration of vases with pigments of any kind, especially the decoration of the pottery of the ancient Greeks, which, unless exceptionally, was executed in monochrome tints and outlines in unvitriifiable pigments. It is the most important of the minor arts of ancient Greece. From the variety and domesticity of the subjects treated, Greek vase-painting is of the greatest importance for the light shed by it upon every phase of ancient life; and from the art side it is equally valuable, not only from the fine decorative and creative quality which it frequently shows, but from the information which it supplies regarding the great art of Greek painting, which has perished. The work bears something the relation to the great art that is borne by the comic and other illustrated prints to the painting of the present day. Historically, after the very ancient kindred styles of Asia Minor, the Egean Islands, and the mainland of Greece (as at Mycenae and Sparta), in which the rude ornament is geometric, or based on plants and animals, usually marine, with occasional admission of human figures, Greek vase-painting may be subdivided into four styles. (1) The Dipylon or early Attic style, so called because the first examples recognized were found near the Dipylon gate in Athens. The ornament is largely geometric, with bands of slim and grotesque men and animals, the design becoming freer with the advance of time. (2) The Corinthian style, in which the characteristic feature is the superposition of bands of animals and monsters, with rosettes and elaborate flowered and fringed borders, the whole following very closely the Assyrian and Phrygian embroideries, which were abundantly imported into Greece at this early time. (See cut under Corinthian.) The earliest distinctively Cypriote vases blend the characteristics of the Dipylon and Corinthian styles. (3) The black-figure style, which, though archaic and often rude, has become the early in the fifth century B. C., and continued until vase-painting was practically abandoned about 200 B. C. It embraces the period of transition from the archaic, to which belong some of the most important vase-painters, and is by far the most important for study. In this style a tendency toward polychromy appears occasionally, but was not consistently worked out, except in the small but admirable class of Attic funeral lecythi. In some elaborate pieces of the fourth and third centuries chiefly Attic, gilding is sparingly introduced. The style implies the presence of figures and of ornamental designs of every kind, very commonly in bands or zones running around the vase, in which the design appears in the natural red of the clay, details being indicated in simple black lines, and the ground being covered with solid glossy black. For examples of the red-figured decoration, see cuts under Greek and Pseudo-Greek.

Vasidæ (vas'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vasum + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, named from the genus Vasum; same as Turbinellida.

vasifactive (vas-i-fak'tiv), a. [L. vas, vessel, + factus, pp. of facere, make (see fact), + -ive.] Causing a new formation of blood vessels; angioplastie. Micros. Sci., N. S., XXX, 313.

vasiform (vas'i-fōrm), a. [L. vas, vessel, + forma, form.] Having the form of a duct or other vessel; of the nature of a vas or vasculum; tubular.—Vasiform elements, in plants, the elements, such as vessels, ducts, etc., which make up the vascular tissue.—Vasiform tissue, tissue made up wholly or in part of vessels or ducts.

Vasinæ, Vasinæ (vā-sī'nē, -nī), n. pl. [NL., < Vasum + -inæ, -ina.] A subfamily of gastropods: same as Cygodontina.

vasoconstrictive (vas'ō-kon-strīk'tiv), a. [L. vas, vessel, + E. constrictor.] Same as vasoconstrictor. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I, 97.

vasoconstrictor (vas'ō-kon-strīk'tor), a. and n. [L. vas, vessel, + E. constrictor.] I. a. Serving to constrict vessels when stimulated, as certain nerves: opposed to vasodilator. Both are included under vasomotor.

II. n. That which causes contraction of the blood-vessels: applied to nerves and to certain drugs.

vasodentinal (vas'ō-den'ti-nal), a. [L. vasodentine + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of vasodentine.

vasodentine (vas'ō-den'tin), n. [L. vas, a vessel, + den(t)-is, = E. tooth, + -ine.] A vascular form of dentine in which blood circulates; dentine whose capillaries are large enough for the passage of red blood-disks. Compare osteodentine and vitrindentine.

vasodilator (vas'ō-di-lā'tor), a. and n. [L. vas, vessel, + E. dilator.] I. a. Serving to dilate or relax blood-vessels when stimulated, as a nerve. See vasomotor.

II. n. That which causes dilatation of the blood-vessels: applied to nerves and certain drugs.

vasoformative (vas'ō-fōr'ma-tiv), a. [L. vas, vessel, + E. formative.] Forming or building up vessels, usually blood-vessels; vasifactive.

vasoganglion (vas'ō-gang'gli-on), n.; pl. vasoganglia (-ā). [L. vas, vessel, + E. ganglion.] A network or knot of vessels: a vascular rete.

vaso-inhibitory (vas'ō-in-hib'i-tō-ri), a. [L. vas, vessel, + E. inhibitory.] Relating to the nerve-force causing dilatation of the blood-vessels. See inhibitory.

vasomotion (vas'ō-mō'shon), n. [L. vas, vessel, + E. motion.] Increase or diminution of the caliber of a vessel, usually a blood-vessel.

vasomotor (vas'ō-mō'tor), a. [L. vas, vessel, + E. motor.] Serving to regulate the tension of blood-vessels, as nerves; vasomotorial, whether vasoconstrictor or vasodilator. Compare inhibition, 3. Also vasculomotor.—Vasomotor center. Same as vascular center. See vascular.—Vasomotor coryza, a name given, in accordance with a theoretical pathology, to autumnal catarrh, or hay-fever. N. Y. Med. Jour., Sept. 3, 1887.—Vasomotor nerves, the nerves supplied to the muscular coat of the blood-vessels.—Vasomotor spasm, spasm of the middle coat of the blood-vessels.

vasomotorial (vas'ō-mō-tō-ri-āl), a. [L. vasomotor + -al.] Pertaining to the vasomotor function: vasomotor.

vasomotory (vas'ō-mō'tō-ri), a. [L. vasomotor + -y.] Same as vasomotorial. Lancet, 1891, I, 370.

vasoperitoneal (vas'ō-per'i-tō-nē'al), a. [L. vas, vessel, + E. peritoneal.] In echinoderms, noting the shut sac which results from the cutting off from the archenteron of a cæcal diverticulum to which the anterior part of that cavity gives rise. The vesicle subsequently opens on the exterior by a pore, through a diverticulum from itself, and divides later into two sections—an ambulacral sac, which lays the foundation for the whole ambulacral system of vessels, and a peritoneal sac, which gives rise to the peritoneum (whence the name).

vasquine (vas-kēn'), n. Same as basquine. Scott, Abbot, II, 151.

vassal (vas'al), n. and a. [Formerly also vassall, rarely vassaile; < ME. vassal, < OF. vassal, F. vassal = Pr. vassal, vassau = Cat. vassal = Sp. vasallo = Pg. Ir. fas, growing, growth, and E. warl. Hence ult. varlet, valet, vassalage, varasor.] I. n. 1. A feudatory tenant; one holding lands by the obligation to render military service or its equivalent to his superior, especially in contradistinction to rear vassal and varasor; a vassal of the first order—that is, one holding directly from the king. Compare great vassal, below.

The two earls . . . complained of the misrepresentations of their enemies and the oppression of their vassals, and alleged that the cause of their flight was not dread of those enemies, but fear of God and the king.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 353.

A Vassal or Vasseur was the holder or grantee of a feud under a prince or sovereign lord.

W. K. Sullivan, Intro. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. cxxvi.

2. A subject; a dependent; a retainer; a servant; one who attends on or does the will of another.

Passions ought to be her [the mind's] vassals, not her masters. Raleigh.

I am his fortune's vassal. Shak., A. and C., v. 2, 29.

I desire not to live longer than I may be thought to be what I am, and shall ever be your faithful and obedient Vassal. Baker, Chronicles, p. 164.

3. A bondman; a slave.

Let such vile vassals, borne to base vocation, Drudge in the world, and for their living droyle, Which have no wit to live withouten toyle.

Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 156.

II. a. Pertaining to the Vaudois or Waldenses.

vaudois, vaudou, vaudoux. See roodou.

vault<sup>1</sup> (vált), n. [With inserted t (as also in fault), in imitation of the orig. form; early mod. E. vaut, voute, vante, also vout. < ME. vauite, voute, voute, vout, < OF. voute, voute, later voute, F. voite (= Pr. volla, volla, vota = It. volla), a vault, arch, vaulted roof. < voll, vout, bowed, arched, < L. volatus (> volatus, > volutus), pp. of volvare, turn around, roll: see volve, volute.]

1. An arched roof; a concave roof or roof-like covering; the canopy of heaven.

O, you are men of stones.
Had I your tongues and eyes, I'd use them so That heaven's vault should crack.

Shak., Lear, v. 3. 259.

A very lofty vault . . . is made over his [Antenor's] monument.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 154.

Nor bird would sing, nor lamb would bleat,
Nor any cloud would cross the vault.

Tennyson, Mariana in the South

2. In arch., a continuous arch, or an arched roof, so constructed that the stones, bricks, or other materials of which it is composed mutually sustain themselves in their places upon their abutments, and that their joints radiate from some central point or line (or points or lines). Vaults are of various kinds, cylindrical, elliptical, single, double, cross, diagonal, pointed, etc. When a vault of which the curve is an arc of a circle is of greater height than half its span, it is said to be surmounted, and when of less height, surbaissé. A rampant vault is a vault which springs from planes not parallel to the horizon. One vault placed above or inclosing another constitutes a double vault. A conical vault is formed as it were upon part of the surface of a cone, and a spherical vault upon part of the surface of a sphere. A vault is simple when it is formed upon the surface of some regular solid, around one axis, and compound when compounded of two or more simple vaults or parts of such vaults. (Compare Roman and medieval architecture, under Roman and medieval.) A groined vault is a compound vault formed by the intersection of two or more vaults crossing each other. See groin, groined, and cuts under aisle, crypt, and nave.

1. barrel-vault; 2. intersecting vault; 3. dome vault; 4. stilt vault.

D. Now. What is this vaultage for, is fashion'd here?

Gresh. Stowage for merchants ware, and strangers goods.

Heywood, If you Know not me (Works, 1874, I. 290).

vaulted (vált'ed), a. [< vault<sup>1</sup> + -ed.] 1. Arched; concave: as, a vaulted roof.

Vaulted all within, like to the Skye
In which the Gods doe dwell eternally.

Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 43.

A present deity, they shout around;

A present deity, the vaulted roofs rebound.

Dryden, Alexander's Feast, I. 36.

2. Covered with an arch or vault.

Undre theise Stages ben Stables wel y vaulted for the Emperours Hors; and alle the Pileres ben of Marbelle.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 17.

First a loggia, then a plain vaulted building.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 65.

3. Provided with vaults or underground passages.

The said citie of Alexandria is an old thing decayed or runnate, . . . being all vaulted underneath for provision of fresh water.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 281.

4. In bot., arched like the roof of the mouth, as the upper lip of many ringent flowers.—5. In zool., notably arched or convex, as a shell, or the beak of a bird; farnicated.

vaulter (vált'tér), n. [< vault<sup>2</sup> + -er.] One who or that which vaults; a leaper; a tumbler; a dancer.

The most celebrated Master, Mr. Simpson the famous Vaulter.

Vegetable leather, marrow, mercury. See the nouns.—Vegetable mold, mold or soil containing a considerable proportion of vegetable constituents; mold consisting wholly or chiefly of humus.—Vegetable naphtha. Same as wood-naphtha.—Vegetable oyster. Same as onster-plant, 2.—Vegetable parchment. Same as parchment paper (which see, under paper).—Vegetable physiology, that branch of botany which treats of the vital actions of plants, or of the offices which their various organs perform.—Vegetable serpent. Same as snake-cucumber. See cucumber.—Vegetable sheep. Same as sheep-plant. See Rauwolfia.—Vegetable silk, a fine and glossy fiber, kindred to silk-cotton, borne on the seeds of Chorisia speciosa in Brazil. The name is applicable to various similar substances. Compare silk-cotton, under cotton.—Vegetable sponge. See sponge-gourd.—Vegetable sulphur. Same as lycopode.—Vegetable tallow, tissue, wax, etc. See the nouns.—Vegetable towel, the sponge-gourd.—Vegetable turpeth. See turpeth, 1.

II. n. 1. A plant. See plant. 2. In a more limited sense, a herbaceous plant used wholly or in part for culinary purposes, or for feeding cattle, sheep, or other animals, as cabbage, cauliflower, turnips, potatoes, spinach, peas, and beans. The whole plant may be so used, or its tops or leaves, or its roots, tubers, etc., or its fruit or seed.

Southwistle, dandelion, and lettuce are their favourite vegetables, especially the last.

Courper, Account of his Hares, May 28, 1784.

Chattel vegetable. See chattel.—Leather vegetable, a shrubby West Indian plant, Euphorbia punicea: so named from its coriaceous leaves. The flower-cluster has long scarlet bracts.—Syn. Vegetable, Plant, Herb, Tree, Shrub, Bush, Undershrub, Vine. Vegetable and plant in scientific use alike denote any member whatever of the vegetable kingdom. In popular use a vegetable is a culinary herb, and a plant is comparatively small, either an herb, or a shrub or tree when quite young, particularly a cultivated herb. An herb is a plant without a woody stem, hence dying to the root, or throughout, each year. A tree is a plant having a woody aerial stem, typically single below and branching above, the whole with a height of not less than four or five times the human stature. A shrub is a woody plant, typically lower than a tree and branching near or below the ground. A bush is a shrub of medium size, forming a clump of stems, or at least of a branching habit. An undershrub is a very small shrub. A vine is an herb, shrub, or even tree, with a long and slender stem which is not self-supporting. See the several words.

vegetablize (vej'ē-tā-blīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vegetablized, ppr. vegetablizing. [ < vegetable + -ize.] To render vegetable in character or appearance.

Silk is to be vegetablized . . . by an immersion in a bath of cellulose dissolved in ammoniacal copper oxide.

O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 36.

vegetal (vej'ē-tal), a. and n. [OF. vegetal, F. végétal = Sp. Pg. vegetal = It. vegetale, < L. vegetus, living, lively: see vegetate.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining, or relating to a plant or plants; having the characteristics or nature of a vegetable; vegetable.

On the whole it appears to me to be the most convenient to adhere to the old plan of calling such of those low forms as are more animal in habit Protozoa, and such as are more vegetal Protophyta.

Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 281.

2. Of or pertaining to the series of vital phenomena common to plants and animals—namely, digestion and nutritive assimilation, growth, absorption, secretion, excretion, circulation, respiration, and generation, as contradistinguished from sensation and volition, which are peculiar to animals.

The first are called the vegetal functions, the second the animal functions; and the powers or forces on which they depend have been termed respectively the vegetal life and the animal life.

Brande and Cox, Dict. Sci., Lit., and Art, III. 930.

II. n. A plant; a vegetable.

A cloth or other fabric or material intended to conceal something from the eye; a curtain.

The veil of the temple was rent in twain.

Mat. xxvii. 51.

2. A piece of stuff, usually very light and more or less transparent, as lawn or lace, intended to conceal, wholly or in part, the features from close observation, while not materially obstructing the vision of the wearer; hence, such a piece of stuff forming a head-dress or part of a head-dress, especially for women. In the early middle ages the veil was commonly circular or semi-circular in shape, and was worn in many ways. At a later time it was attached to the high and heavy head-dresses, such as the escuffion and the hennin, and was a mere ornamental appendage, not admitting of being drawn over the face. The veil, when small, is indistinguishable from the kerchief. In modern use the veil is a piece of gauze, grenadine, lace, crape, or similar fabric used to cover the face, either for concealment or as a screen against sunlight, dust, insects, etc. In this capacity it usually forms no necessary part of the head-dress, but is attached to the bonnet or hat.

4. A scarf tied to or hanging from a pastoral staff. See orarium, 3, sacrum (a), verilum, and banderole, 1 (b).—5. In anat. and zool., a velum.—6. In bot.: (a) In Hymenoptera, same as velum, 2 (a). (b) In Discomyctes, a membranous or fibrous coating stretching over the mouth of the cup. (c) In mosses, same as calyptra, 1 (a).—7. In phonation, an obscuration of the clearness of the tones, either from a natural conformation of the larynx or from some accidental condition, as fatigue or a cold. The natural veil in some gifted and highly trained singers is often a beauty, while a huskiness due to imperfect use or accidental interference is a decided blemish. A voice in which a veil is present is called veiled, or voce velata or voix sombre.—Demi-veil, a short veil worn by women, which superseded about 1855 the long veil previously worn.—Egyptian veil, in modern costume for women, a veil worn about the head and neck and tied under the chin.—Eucharistic veils, sacramental veils, the veils or cloths of linen, silk, etc., used to cover the eucharistic vessels and the elements or species during the celebration of mass or holy communion. Those ordinarily used in the Western Church are the pall, the chalice-veil, which covers both chalice and paten before, after, and during part of celebration, and, in the Anglican Church, the post-communion veil. To these may be added the corporal (partly used to cover the bread), the humeral veil, and formerly the offertory veil. In the Greek Church there are separate veils for the paten and chalice, and a third veil, of thinner material, the air or aer, covering both.—Humeral, Lenten, offertory veil. See the qualifying words.—Marginal veil. See velum, 2 (a).—

To take the veil, to assume the veil according to the custom of a woman when she becomes a nun; hence, to retire to a nunnery. On first entering the nunnery the applicant takes the white veil; if after her novitiate she desires to become a nun, in certain convents she takes the black veil, when she pronounces the irrevocable vows.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, i. 1.

No fog-cloud veiled the deep.

Whittier, The Exiles.

She bow'd as if to veil a noble tear.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

3. Figuratively, to conceal; mask; disguise.

To keep your great pretences veild till when They needs must show themselves.

Shak., Cor., i. 2. 20.

Half to show, half veil the deep intent.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 4.

Veiled calamary, a cephalopod of the genus Histioteuthis, with six arms webbed together, the other arms loose, and the coloration gorgeous.—Veiled plate, in photog., a negative or other plate of which the parts that should be clear are obscured by a slight fog.—Veiled voice. See veil, n., 7.

veiler (vā'ler), n. [Formerly also vailer; < veil + -er.] One who or that which veils.

Swell'd windes

And fearefull thunder, vailer of earth's pride.

Tourneur, Trans. Metamorphosis, st. 3.

veiling (va'ling), n. [Formerly also vailing; verbal n. of veil, v.] 1. The act of concealing with a veil.—2. A veil; a thin covering.—3. Material for making veils: as, nun's-veiling; silk veiling.

veiless (vā'les), a. [< veil + -less.] Destitute of a veil. Tennyson, Geraint.

veilleuse (vā'lyez'), n. [F., a night-light, a float-light, < veille, watch, vigil; see vigil.] In decorative art, a shaded night-lamp. The shade or screen in such lamps was frequently the medium for rich decoration.

vein (vān), n. [< ME. veine, veyne, vayne, < OF. (and F.)

veine = Sp. It. vena = Pg. veia, < L. vena, a blood-vessel, vein, artery, also a watercourse, a vein of metal, a vein or streak of wood or stone, a row of trees, strength, a person's natural bent, etc.; prob. orig. a pipe or channel for conveying a fluid, < vehere, carry, convey; see vehicle, and cf. veil, from the same source.]

1. In anat., one of a set of blood-vessels conveying blood from the periphery to the physiological center of the circulation; one of a set of membranous canals or tubes distributed in nearly all the tissues and organs of the body, for the purpose of carrying blood from these parts to the heart. The walls of the veins are thinner, as a rule, and more flaccid, than those of the arteries; they are composed of three layers or coats—the outer fibrous; the middle, made up chiefly of sparse muscular fibers; and the inner or serous. The inner or lining membrane, especially in the veins of the lower extremities, presents numerous crescentic folds, usually in man occurring in pairs, known as the valves of the veins, which serve to prevent a backward flow of the blood. The nutrition of the walls is provided for by the pasa vasorum. The nerves supplying the walls of the veins are few in number. There are two systems of veins—the systemic, or those carrying venous blood from the tissues of the body to the right auricle of the heart; and the pulmonary, or those carrying the oxygenated blood from the lungs to the left auricle of the heart. The portal system is a subdivision of the systemic, in which blood coming from the digestive organs is conducted to the liver by the portal vein, circulates throughout this organ, is again collected in the hepatic veins, and is thence carried to the right auricle of the heart. The veins of the portal system have no valves. The blood in the systemic veins is darkened in color, and flows in a continuous stream. The umbilical veins of the fetus, like the pulmonary veins, convey oxygenated or arterial blood. As a general rule, the corresponding veins and arteries run side by side, and are called by the same names. In fishes and other low vertebrates which breathe by gills, the veins from these organs correspond in function, but not morphologically, with pulmonary veins. There is a renoportal system of veins in some animals, as Amphibia and reptiles, by which the kidneys receive blood from veins as well as by renal arteries. See phrases below, and vena. See also cuts under circulation, heart, liver, lung, mediant, and thorax.

That the freike, with the frusche, fell of his horse.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 5829.

2. Loosely, any blood-vessel. Many of the veins being superficial or subcutaneous, liable to ordinary observation, and when swollen or congested very conspicuous, the name is popularized, and extended to the arteries, while artery remains chiefly a technical term.

As will disperse itself through all the veins.

Shak., R. and J., v. 1. 61.

3. In entom., one of the ribs or horny tubes which form the framework of the wings of an insect, and between which the thin membrane of the wings is spread and supported; a nervure. Veins result from certain thickenings of the upper and under surfaces of the sac which primarily composes the wing, these thickenings being exactly coapted, and often hollowed or channeled for the reception of air-tubes—which enables the wings to subserve to some extent the functions of lungs. The primary veins give out veinlets or nervules. The venation of the wings differs much in different insects, but is sufficiently constant in each case to afford valuable classificatory characters. See cuts under Chrysopa, Cirrophanus, nervure, and venation.

4. In bot., a fibrovascular bundle at or near the surface of a leaf, sepal, petal, etc.: same as nerv, 7. See nervation.—5. In mining, an occurrence of ore, usually disseminated through a gangue or veinstone, and having a more or less regular development in length, width, and depth. A  fissure-vein, or true vein, is a vein in which the ore and veinstone occupy a preexisting fissure or crack in the rocks, which has been formed by some deep-seated cause or crust-movement, and may therefore be presumed to extend downward indefinitely, and for the same reason is likely to have considerable development in length. True veins usually have well-defined walls, on which there is more or less flucan or gouge, and which are often striated or polished, giving rise to what miners call stickensides. True veins often have the ore and veinstone arranged in parallel plates or layers, called combs. Experience shows that true veins are more to be depended on for permanence in depth than other more irregular deposits, although the latter are often highly productive for a time. A vein and a lode are, in common usage, essentially the same thing, the former being rather the scientific, the latter the miner's, name for it. The term deposit, when used by itself, means an irregular occurrence of ore, such as a flat-mass, stock, contact deposit, carbons, and the like; but when to deposits the term ore or metalliferous is prefixed (ore-deposits, metalliferous deposits), the designation becomes the most general one possible, including every form of occurrence of the metalliferous ores, and having the same meaning as the French gîtes métallifères and the German Erzlagerstätten. A bed of rock forming a member of a stratified formation, with which it was synchronously deposited, cannot properly be called a vein or lode, even if it has metalliferous matter generally disseminated through it in quantity sufficient to be worth working, as is the case with the cuprififerous slate (Kupferschiefer) of Mansfeld in Prussia, or when it is concentrated in pipes or pipe-like masses, occurring here and there in the stratum, as in the silver-lead mines of Eureka in Nevada. (See ore-deposit.) Further—(a) for forms of ore-deposits which are not true veins, but which are designated by the name vein, see gash-vein, segregated vein (also segregation), pipe-vein; (b) for forms qualified, according to general usage, by the name deposit (which also see), and which are still further removed from the class of true veins than those previously noted, see contact deposit (under contact), blanket-deposit; (c) for other still more irregular forms of ore-deposit, which have special names, and which, while not themselves properly designated as veins, are frequently more or less closely connected with true veins, occurring in close proximity, and forming a kind of appendage, to them, see flag, 10, pipe, 16, carbonyl impregnation, 4; and (d) for German mining terms applied to various irregular forms of ore-deposit, not true veins, which terms are often used by scientific writers in English in describing

2. In bot. and zool., veined; provided with veins or nervus.

veinstone (van'stôn), n. 1. The earthy or non-metalliferous part of a lode, vein, or ore-deposit. See gangue.—2. A concretion formed within a vein; a phlebolite. Also veinous calculus.

vein-stuff (van'stuf), n. Same as lodestuff.

veinule (vā'nul), n. [< F. veinule, < L. venula, dimin. of vena, vein: see vein.] A minute vein.

veiny (vā'ni), a. [< vein + -y.] Full of veins; veined, in any sense.

Hence the veiny Marble shines;

Hence Labour draws his tools.

Thomson, Summer, l. 135.

Vejovis (vē-jō'vis), n. [NL. (Koch, 1836), also Vajovis, < L. Vejovis, Vajovis, Vedioris, an Etruscan divinity regarded as opposed to Jupiter, < ve-, not, + Jovis, Jupiter, Jove: see Jove.] A notable genus of scorpions, having ten eyes and a pentagonal sternum, with some authors giving name to a family Vejovidae.

vekil (ve-kel'), n. Same as wakil.

vekket, n. Same as veek.

vela, n. Plural of velum.

velamen (vē-lā'men), n.; pl. velamina (-mi-nā). [NL. < L. velamen, a covering, veil, < velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] Same as velamentum.—Velamen nativum, the integument or skin.—Velamen vulvæ, the pudendal apone; an enormous hypertrophy of the labia minora, which sometimes hang down in long flaps on the thighs. It is commonly called Hottentot apone, from the fact that it is often seen in women of this race.

velamentous (vel-a-men'tus), a. [< velamentum + -ous.] 1. In the form of a thin membranous sheet; veil-like.—2. Resembling or serving as a sail: as, the velamentous arms of the nautilus.

velamentum (vel-a-men'tum), n.; pl. velamenta (-tā). [NL. < L. velamentum, a cover, covering, < velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] In anat. and zool., a membrane or membranous envelop; a covering, as a veil or velum.—Velamenta bombycina, villous membranes.—Velamenta cerebraia or cerebri, the meninges of the brain.—Velamenta infantis, the enveloping membranes of the fetus.—Velamentum abdominale, the peritoneum.—Velamentum lingue, the glosso epiglottic folds or ligament: three folds of mucous membrane passing from the root of the tongue to the epiglottis.

velar (vē-lār), a. [< L. velaris, < velum, veil: see veil.] Of or pertaining to a veil or velum; forming or formed into a velum; specifically, in philol., noting certain sounds, as those represented by the letters gv, kw, qu, produced by the aid of the veil of the palate, or soft palate.

They [the Semitic alphabets] have no symbols for certain classes of sounds, such as the velar gutturals, which are found in other languages.

velarium (vē-lā'ri-um), n.; pl. velaria (-ā). [L. < velum, veil: see veil.] 1. An awning which was often drawn over the roofless Roman theaters and amphitheaters to protect the spectators from rain or the sun. Also velum.—2. [NL.] In zool., the marginal membrane of certain hydrozoans; the velum. See velum, 4.

velary (vē-lār-i), a. [< L. velum, a sail, + -ary, 2.] Pertaining to a ship's sail.

velate (vē-lāt), a. [< L. velatus, pp. of velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] Veiled; specifically, in zool. and bot., having a velum.

Velates (vē-lā'tez), n. [NL. (Montfort, 1810), irreg. < L. velatus, pp. of velare, cover, veil: see veil.] A genus of fossil gastropods, of the family Neritidae, which lived during the Eocene age, as V. perversus.

velation (vē-lā'shon), n. [< LL. velatio(n)-, a veiling, < L. velare, pp. of velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] 1.

A veiling; the act of covering or the state of being covered with or as with a veil; hence, concealment; mystery; secrecy: the opposite of revelation.—2. Formation of a velum.

velatura (vel-a-tō'rā), n. [It., < velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] In the fine arts, the art or process of glazing a picture by rubbing on a thin covering of color with the hand. It was a device much practised by early Italian painters.

veldt (velt), n. [Also veld; < D. veld, field, ground, land: see field.] In South Africa, an unforested or thinly forested tract of land or region; grass country. The higher tracts of this character, entirely destitute of timber, are sometimes called the high veldt; areas thinly covered with undergrowth, scrub, or bush are known as bush-veldt.

The pastoral lands or velds, which extend chiefly around the outer slopes and in the east, are distinguished, according to the nature of the grass or sedge which they produce, as "sweet" or "sour." Encyc. Brit., v. 12.

velet, n. An old spelling of veil.

Velella (vē-lē'lā), n. [NL. (Lamarck; Oken, 1815), dim. of

L. velum, veil: see veil.] 1. The typical genus of Veledidae. The best-known member of the genus is V. vulgaris, the sallee-man, an inch or two in length, semi-transparent, of a beautiful blue color, floating on the surface of the sea, with a vertical crest like a sail (whence the name). Another is V. mutica.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Veledidae (vē-lē'lā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Velella + -idae.] A family of discoidal oceanic hydrozoans, represented by the genera Velella and Porpita, belonging to the order Physophora and suborder Discoidae. The stem is converted into a disk with a system of canalicular cavities, above which rests a pneumatocyst or float of dense tough texture. From the disk hang the hydriform persons (see person, 8), usually a gastrozoid surrounded by smaller persons which give rise to generative medusiforms, and by marginal dactylozooids. The medusiforms mature before their liberation from the stock; when free, these formed the pseudogenus Chrysomitra. The Veledidae are nearly related to the well-known Portuguese man-of-war.

Velia (vē-lī-ā), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1807), perhaps < Velia, a Greek colony in southern Italy.] A genus of semi-aquatic water-bugs, typical of the family Velidae. It is represented by a few species only, in South America, Mexico, and Europe. V. rivulorum of Europe is the largest and best-known species. It is found in England, Germany, France, Spain, and Italy, upon clear rivers and creeks, from early spring until cold weather in autumn.

velic (vē'lik), a. [< L. velum, a sail, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a ship's sail.—Velic point. Same as center of effort (which see, under center).

veliferous (vē-lif'ē-rus), a. [< L. velifer, sail-bearing, < velum, a veil, sail (see veil), + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Bearing or carrying sails: as, "veliferous chariots,"  Evelyn, Navigation and Commerce, § 25. [Rare.]—2. In zool., having a velum; velate; veligerous; velamentous.

veliform (vē-lī'fōrm), a. [< L. velum, veil, + forma, form.] Forming a velum; resembling or serving as a veil or velum; velamentous.

veliger (vē-lī-jēr), n. [< LL. veliger, sail-bearing: see veligerous.] One who or that which bears a velum; in Mollusca, specifically, the veligerous stage of the embryo, or the embryo in that stage, when it has a ciliated swimming-membrane or velum (see velum, 3, and tyembryo). The veliger develops directly from the mere trochophore with its circlet of cilia, and continues through the period of persistence of the ciliated formation, which assumes various shapes in the different groups of mollusks.

veligerous (vē-lī-j'ē-rus), a. [< LL. veliger, sail-bearing, < L. velum, sail, veil, + gerere, bear.] In zool., bearing a velum; veliferous: specifically noting an embryonic stage of mollusks. See velum, 3, and cut under veliger. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 416.

Velidae (vē-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Amyot and Serville, 1843, in form Velides, < Velia + -idae.] A family of heteropterous insects, of the section Aurocoris, closely related to the Hydrobatidae or water-striders. The body is usually stout, oval, and broadest across the prothorax. The rostrum is three-jointed, and the legs are not very long. They live mainly upon the surface of the water, always near the banks, but also move with great freedom on land. About 12 species, of 6 genera, occur in the United States.

velitation (vē-lī-tā'shon), n. [< L. velitatio(n)-, a bickering, a dispute, < velitari, skirmish, < veles (velit-), a light-armed soldier; cf. velex, swift, unimpeded: see velocity.] A dispute or contest; a slight skirmish. Blount, 1670.

velite (vē-līt), n. [< L. velites, pl. of veles, a kind of light-armed soldier.] A light-armed Roman soldier. Soldiers of this class were first formed into a corps at the siege of Capua, 211 B. C., and disappeared about a century later.

vell<sup>1</sup> (vel), n. [A dial. form of fell, skin: see fell, etc.] 1. A skin; membrane.—2. The rennet of the calf. [Prov. Eng.]

vell<sup>2</sup> (vel), v. t. [< vell<sup>1</sup>, n.] To cut off the turf or sward of land. [Prov. Eng.]

Vella (vē-lā), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < L. vela, given as the Gallic name of the plant called erysimum or irio: see Erysimum.] A genus of plants, of the order Cruciferae and tribe Brassicæ. It is characterized by a short, turgid, gibbous silique with a broad tongue-like beak, and only one or two seeds in each cell. The 3 species are all natives of Spain; they are much-branched and diminutive shrubs with erect, rigid, woody, and sometimes spiny stems. They bear entire leaves, and rather large yellow flowers somewhat spicately disposed, the lower flowers bracteate. They are known as Spanish cress and as cress-rocket.

vellarin (vē-lā-rin), n. A substance extracted from Hydrocotyle, or pennywort.

vellety (vē-lē'ti), n. [= F. vellété = Sp. velledad = Pg. velledade = It. velletà, < ML. velletia(t)-s, irreg. < L. velle, will, wish: see will.] Volition in the weakest form; an indolent or inactive wish or inclination toward a thing, which leads to no energetic effort to obtain it: chiefly a scholastic term.

Though even in nature there may be many good inclinations to many instances of the Divine commandments, yet it can go no further than this vellety, this desiring to do good, but is not able.

Ser. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 12.

Vellety—the term used to signify the lowest degree of desire, and that which is next to none at all, when there is so little uneasiness in the absence of any thing that it carries a man no farther than some faint wishes for it.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xx. 6.

vellett, n. An obsolete form of velvet.

velli, n. Plural of vellus.

vellicate (vē-lī-kāt), v. [< L. vellicatus, pp. of vellicare, pluck, twitch, < vellere, pluck, tear out.] 1. trans. To twitch; cause to twitch convulsively, as the muscles and nerves of animals.

Convulsions arising from something vellicating a nerve. Arbuthnot.

II. intrans. 1. To move spasmodically; twitch, as a nerve.—2. To carp or detract. Blount.

vellication (vē-lī-kā'shon), n. [< L. vellicatio(n)-, a plucking, twitching, < vellicare, pluck, twitch: see vellicare.] 1. The act of twitching or of causing to twitch.—2. A twitching or convulsive motion of a muscular fiber. Compare subsaltus.

There must be a particular sort of motion and vellication impart upon my nerves, . . . else the sensation of heat will not be produced. Watts, Improvement of Mind, xix.

vellicative (vē-lī-kā-tiv), a. [< vellicare + -ive.] Having the power of vellicating, plucking, or twitching.

vellon (vē-lō'n), n. [< Sp. vellon = Pg. billão, billão, a copper coin of Castile: see billon, bullion.] A Spanish money of account. The term is also used like the English word sterling. The reale de vellon is worth about 4½ cents.

velloped (vē-lō'pēd), a. [Appar. a corruption of jelliped, ult. of develloped.] In her-, having pendant gills or wattles like those of a cock: a term used only when the gills are borne of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing.

Vellozia (vē-lō'zi-ā), n. [NL. (Vandell, 1788), named after a Brazilian scientist Vellozo, who collected the plants.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Amaryllidaceæ, type of the tribe Velloziæ, and distinguished from Barbaecia, the other genus of that tribe, by a perianth-tube not prolonged above the ovary. There are from 30 to 40 species, natives of tropical and southern Africa, Madagascar, and Brazil. They are erect perennials, with a fibrous and usually dichotomous stem densely clothed with the projecting or imbricating bases of fallen leaves, and commonly arborescent. The rigid linear leaves are crowded at the ends of the branches; they are short and strict, or elongated and often pungent-pointed. The flowers are commonly handsome, white, sulphur-yellow, violet, or blue, and are solitary or two or three together within a cluster of leaves; the perianth is bell-shaped or funneliform, with equal ovate-oblong or long-stalked distinct segments. The fruit is a globose-oblong or three-angled capsule, sometimes roughened or echinate. The plant is known as tree-lily, the flowers resembling lilies. The heavy branching trunk, from 2 to 10 feet high, is often as thick as a man's body; its leaves, tufted at the top, suggest those of the yucca. They impart the characteristic aspect to some of the mountainous districts of Brazil.

body. In the embryo before the cerebral and olfactory lobes extend forward, it is the front of the anterior cerebral vesicle, and therefore the anterior termination of the cerebral spinal axis. Also called brachia and lamina terminalis. Velum triangulare. Same as velum interpositum.

velumen (vē-lū'men), n. [NL., < L. velumen, a fleece; cf. vellus, a fleece.] 1. In bot., the velvety coating formed over some leaves by short soft hairs.—2. In zool., velvet; a velvety or velutinous surface or covering.

velure (vē'lūr), n. [OF. velours (with un-orig. ra, velours, velon, velong, F. velours, velvet, < ML. villosus, velvet, lit. 'shaggy' (see pannus, cloth), < L. villosus, shaggy; see collous. Cf. vel-ret, from the same ult. source.] 1. A textile fabric having a thick soft nap; velvet or velveteen.

An old hat

Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, v.

The bragging velure-canonied hobby-horses prance up and down, as if some of the tilsters had ridden 'em. Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, II. 1.

2. A pad of silk or plush used by hatters for smoothing and giving a luster to the surface of hats. Also called loover, lure.

velure (vē'lūr), n. t. [cf. velure, n.] In hat-making, to smooth off or dress with a velure, as the nap of a silk hat.

The hat is retured in a revolving machine by the application of haircloth and velvet velures. Encyc. Brit., XI. 520.

Velutina (vē-lū'ti'nā), n. [NL. (De Blainville, 1825, or earlier), < ML. velutum, velvet.] The typical genus of Velutinidae.

velutine (vē-lū'tin), a. [NL. velutum, velvet, + -ine.] Same as velutinous.

Velutinidae (vē-lū'tin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1840), < Velutina + -idae.] A family of tenebrionate gastropods, typified by the genus Velutina, inhabiting northern seas, having a fragile, ear-shaped, and mostly external shell, the median radular tooth squarish and multicuspoid, and the marginal teeth narrow.

velutinous (vē-lū'ti-nus), a. [cf. velutine + -ous.] Resembling velvet; velvety; soft. Specifically (a) In bot., having a hairy surface which in texture resembles that of velvet, as in Rochelia coccinea. (b) In zool., covered with very close-set short upright hairs, like the pile of velvet.

velveret (vē'l'vēr-et), n. [Irreg. dim. of velvet.] An inferior sort of velvet, the web of which is of cotton and the pile of silk. It is stiff, and keeps its color badly.

velvet (vē'l'vēt), n. and a. [Also vellet (also vel-lute, < It.); < ME. velvet, velcet, felvet, velonnet, velouette, < OF. velvet (Roquefort), velvet (cf. vellucan, velvet, velu, shaggy, velonté, velveteen, velvety, veluette, mouse-ear), = Sp. Pg. velludo, shag, velvet, = OIt. veluto, It. veluto, velvet, < ML. villutus, found only in forms reflecting the Rom., namely, vellutus, velutum, velluctum, vel-luctum, etc.; velvet, lit. (like villosus, velvet, > OF. velous, F. velours, > E. velure 'shaggy' cloth, < L. villus, shaggy hair, wool, nap of cloth, a tuft of hair, akin to vellus, a fleece; cf. Gr. ειπών, wool, E. wool: see wool.) I. n. 1. A closely woven silk stuff having a very thick and short pile on one side, which is formed by carrying part of the warp-thread over a needle, and cutting the loops afterward. Inferior kinds are made with a cotton back (see velveret), and are commonly called cotton-backed velvets. Cotton velvets are also made. (See cotton, and also velveteen.) These imitations and inferior qualities are so common that real velvet is commonly called silk velvet or Lyons velvet to distinguish it from them.

By hir beddes heed she made a mewe,
And covered it with velveteen blewe.

Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 636.

Her shirt was o' the grass-green silk,
Her mantle o' the velvet fyne.

Thomas the Rhymer (Child's Ballads, I. 109).

Velvet (from It. veluto, "shaggy") had a silk weft woven so as to form a raised pile, the ends of which were cut or shaved off to one even level: hence it is also called in Italy raso. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 210.

2. The covering of a growing antler, consisting of the modified periosteum peculiar to antlers, with cuticle and fur. It bears the same relation to the nutrition of the antler that periosteum does to that of bone. Its sloughing or exuviation follows the constriction and final obliteration of its vessels—a process which is accomplished or favored by the growth of the bur about the base of the antler, which cuts off or obstructs the circulation of blood. The antler subsequently receives no nourishment, and is itself shortly afterward exuviated or cast as a foreign body.

Good antlers "in the velvet" will sell readily for four dollars a pound in any part of Siberia.

The Century, XXXVII. 646.

3. Money gained through gambling: as, to play on velvet (that is, to gamble with money previously won). [Slang.] Embossed-velvet work, a kind of needlework done by outlining the raised

3. In music, decided rapidity of tempo or pace, especially in a trio or passage. Absolute, aggregate angular velocity. See the adjectives. Angular velocity of rotation. See rotation. Comparison of velocities. See comparative.

Initial velocity, the rate of movement at the beginning of a velocity. Remaining velocity, the velocity of a body at the end of its flight after leaving the muzzle. Resolution of velocities. See composition.

Terminal velocity. See terminal. Velocity diagram, function, potential. See diagram, etc.—Virtual velocity. See virtual.—Syn. 1. Celerity, Swiftvelonia (vē-lō'nī-ā), n. Same as calanoid.

velouet, velouette, n. Obsolete forms of velvet.

velours (vē-lō'r'), n. [Also velour; < OF. velours, velvet; see velure.] Same as velure; the more common form in trade use. Jute velours, a sort of velvet made of jute, used in upholstery.

veloutine (vē-lō'tēn'), n. [F. veloute, velvet, + -ine.] A French corded fabric of merino and lacy wool.

veltare, veltiver, n. Dialectal forms of field-fart.

A snipe. Swift.

velum (vē-lū'm), n.; pl. vela (-lā). [NL., < L. velum, a veil, sail; see veil.] 1. Same as velarium, 1.

I have crossed the town and entered the primitive theatre, installed in the court-yard of a house covered with a velum, the galleries of the first floor constituting the boxes. Harpers Mag., LXXVIII. 708.

2. In bot.: (a) In Hymenoptera, a special membranous envelop which incloses for a time the whole or a part of the sporophore. When it extends as a horizontal membrane from the margin of the pedicel to the style, it is called velum parietale or marginale. It is ruptured by the expanding pilus, when it forms the rudiment of ring on the style. When the velum is a sac which incloses the whole of the sporophore it is called a velum sacculi, or velum. It is ultimately ruptured at the apex by the expansion of the cap. (b) In Isotiles, the outgrown membranous margin of the fovea. Also called incubarium.—3. In Mollusca, the highly characteristic ciliated formation of the embryo, which serves as an organ of locomotion in that stage when the embryo is called a veliger. It is usually soon lost, but in some cases is permanently retained in a modified form. See cuts under veliger.—4. In Hydrozoa, a kind of flap or circular free edge which projects inward around the margin of the disk of many hydrozoans, as those which are bell-shaped or conical, and which from its presence are called craspedote; a velarium. The velum is present in all well-developed hydromedusans, but seldom in scyphomedusans, in which latter it is known as the peritremium. See cuts under Diphyrida and medusa.

5. In Infusoria, a delicate veil-like membrane bordering the mouth in such forms as Cyclidium and Pleuonema.—6. In sponges, one of the transverse diaphragms or partitions which constrict the lumen of an incurrent or excurrent canal.—7. In Rotifera, the trochal disk. See cuts under trochal, Rotifer, and Rotifera.—8. In Artemia, a membrane attached to the inner side of the cubital spur in certain bees. Kirby and Spence.—9. In Anat., a veil, or a part likened to a veil.—Inferior or posterior medullary velum (velum inferius posterius), a thin white lamella of a semilunar form, continuous by its superior border with the central white substance of the vermis inferior of the cerebellum, and having its concave border free or continuous with the epithelial covering of the hind part of the roof of the fourth ventricle. Sometimes called metatela.—Superior or anterior medullary velum (velum superius anterius). Same as velum of Pons. See Pons.

Velum interpositum, the prolongation of the pia mater over the third ventricle and optic thalami, its highly vascular margins projecting into the lateral ventricles, forming the choroid plexuses of those cavities. Also called velum of Pons, and velum triangulare.

Velum pendulum, velum palati, velum palatinum (the velum palatinum of the palate, the soft or pendulous palate, especially its posterior part, in many animals prolonged into a pendent tent-like process, the uvula. (See cut under uvula.) In cetaceans the velum forms a muscular canal which prolongs the posterior nares to the larynx, which it embraces, an arrangement bearing relation to the spouting of a whale.—Velum terminale, the terminal lamina of the brain; the anterior boundary of the general ventricular cavity of the brain, or front wall of the third ventricle, from the pituitary to the pineal pattern of embossed velvet with gold thread or similar brilliant material. Genoise or Genoa velvet. See Genoise. Raised velvet, velvet in which there is a pattern in relief. Also called embossed velvet. Stamped velvet. See stamp.—Tapestry velvet or patent velvet carpet. See tapestry. Tartan velvet. See tartan. Terry velvet. See terry. To stand on velvet, to have made one's bets so that one cannot lose. [Racing slang.] Uncut velvet, velvet in which the loops are not cut; same as terry. Utrecht velvet, a plush used in velvet upholstery made of mohair, or in inferior qualities, of mohair and cotton.—Velvet upon velvet, velvet of which a part of the pile is higher or deeper than the rest, the raised part forming a pattern. Compare pile upon pile, under pile.

II. a. 1. Made of velvet.

This morning was brought home my new velvet cloak—that is, lined with velvet, a good cloth the outside—the first that I ever had in my life. Pepys Diary, Oct. 29, 1663.

2. Soft and smooth to the touch; resembling velvet in this respect.

The cowslip's velvet head.

Milton, Comus, l. 595.

3. Very soft and smooth to the taste: as, old velvet Bourbon.—Velvet ant, a solitary ant, of the family Mutillidae; a spider-ant; so called from the soft hairy covering. Also sometimes cow-ant.—Velvet chiton, a polyplacophorous mollusk, Cryptochiton stellatus, found from Alaska to California.—Velvet cork. See cork.—Velvet dock. See dock. 2.—Velvet duck, velvet coat. Same as velvet scoter.

Man, that was a fine velvet duck you sent me—as handsome a fellow as ever I set eyes on.

W. Black, in Far Lochaber, xxi.

Velvet fiddler, a kind of crab, Portunus puber.—Velvet osier, runner. See the nouns.—Velvet scoter, a kind of black duck with a large white speculum on the wing, of the subfamily Fuligininae, family Anatidae; the Eidemia

Velvet Scoter, Melanetta velutina, male.

fessa, a bird of Europe, the American variety of which is sometimes called Eidemia or Melanetta velutina, white-winged scoter, etc. See scoter.—Velvet sponge, tamarind. See the nouns.

Velvet (vel'vet), v. [< velvet, n.] I. intrans. To produce velvet-painting.

Verdure . . . is the palest green that is, but good to velvet upon black in any drapery. Peacham, Drawing.

II. trans. To cover with velvet; cause to resemble velvet. [Rare.]

Velvetbreast (vel'vet-breſt), n. The American merganser or sheldrake, Mergus americanus. [Connecticut.]

Velvet-bur (vel'vet-ber), n. See Priva.

Velvet-cloth (vel'vet-kloth), n. A plain smooth cloth with a gloss, used in embroidery. Dict. of Needlework.

Velvet-ear (vel'vet-ēr), n. A shell of the family Volutinidae.

Velveteen (vel-ve-tēn'), n. [< velvet + -een.] 1. A kind of fustian made of twilled cotton, with a pile of the same material.—2. A kind of velvet made of silk and cotton mixed throughout the fabric. This material has been greatly improved, and almost equals silk velvet in beauty.—Ribbed velveteen, a strong material of the nature of fustian, having ribs or ridges of velvety pile alternating with depressed lines which are smooth and without pile.

Velvet-flower (vel'vet-flou'ēr), n. The love-lies-bleeding, Amarantus caudatus: so named from its soft velvety flower-spikes. In one old work applied to the French marigold, Tugetes patula.

Velvet-grass (vel'vet-grās), n. See Holcus.

Velvet-guards (vel'vet-gārdz), n. pl. Velvet trimmings; hence, persons having their garments trimmed with velvet. See guard, n., 5 (c), and guard, v. t., 3.

To velvet-guards and Sunday citizens.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 1. 261.

These velvet-guards, and black-laced sleeves. Prynne.

Velveting (vel'vet-ing), n. [< velvet + -ing.] 1. The fine nap or shag of velvet.—2. pl. Velvet goods collectively; also, a piece of velvet goods: as, a stock of velveting.

Velvet-jacket (vel'vet-jak'et), n. Part of the distinctive dress of a steward in a noble family; hence, the man wearing it (in the quotation it refers to the mayor of a city); hence, one in the service of the king.

Spoken like a man, and true velvet jacket.

And we will enter, or strike by the way.

Heywood, 1 Edw. IV. (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, I. 17).

Velvetleaf (vel'vet-lēf), n. 1. A downy-leaved tropical vine, Cissampelos Pareira, furnishing a medicinal root. See pareira.—2. See Lactuca.—3. In the United States, the Indian mallow, Abutilon Arizonicum, an annual plant with downy heart-shaped leaves. Sometimes called American jute. See jute.—East Indian velvetleaf. See Tournefortia.

Velvet-loom (vel'vet-lōm), n. A loom for making pile fabrics. E. H. Knight.

Velvet-moss (vel'vet-mōs), n. A lichen, Umbilicaria murina, used in dyeing, found in the Dovre Fjeld Mountains of Norway.

Velvet-painting (vel'vet-pān'ting), n. The art or practice of coloring or painting on velvet.

Velvet-paper (vel'vet-pā'pēr), n. Same as flock-paper.

Velvet-pee (vel'vet-pē), n. [< velvet + **pee*, put, in put-jacket: see put-jacket.] A velvet jacket.

Though now your blockhead be covered with a Spanish block, and your lashed shoulders with a velvet-pee.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, ii. 1.

Velvet-pile (vel'vet-pil), n. 1. The pile of velvet; also, a pile or nap like that of velvet.—2. A material other than velvet, so called from its having a long soft nap, as a carpet.

Velvet-satin (vel'vet-sat'in), n. A silk material of which the ground is satin with the pattern in velvet-pile.

Velvetseed (vel'vet-sēd), n. A small rubiaceous tree, Guetarda elliptica, of the West Indies and Florida. [West Indies.]

Velvet-work (vel'vet-wērċ), n. Embroidery upon velvet.

Velvety (vel'vet-i), a. [< velvet + -y.] 1. Resembling velvet; having a nap like that of velvet; also, soft and smooth to the eye or to the touch, somewhat like velvet: as, velvety texture among minerals.

Textures are principally of three kinds:—(1) Lustrous, as of water and glass. (2) Bloomy, or velvety, as of a rose-leaf or peach. (3) Linear, produced by filaments or threads, as in feathers, fur, hair, and woven or reticulated tissues. Ruskin, Lectures on Art, § 135.

2. Having a peculiar soft or smooth taste.

The rum is velvety, sugary, with a pleasant, soothing effect. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 216.

3. Having a contact like that of velvet; touching softly: as, a velvety touch on the piano.

Vena (vē'nā), n.; pl. venæ (nē). [NL., < L. vena, a blood-vessel, a vein: see vein.] In anat., a vein. See vein.

Fossa of the vena cava. See fossa.

Vena azygos, an azygos vein. See azygos.

Vena cava, either of the two main trunks of the systemic venous system, discharging into the right cardiac auricle. (a) The inferior or ascending vena cava returns the blood from the lower limbs and abdomen, beginning at the junction of the two common iliac veins in front of the fourth lumbar vertebra, and thence ascending on the right side of the aorta to and through the tendon of the diaphragm to empty into the lower part of the right cardiac auricle. It receives the lumbar, spermatic, renal, capsular, hepatic, and inferior phrenic veins. (b) The superior or descending vena cava returns the blood from the head and neck, the upper limbs, and the whole of the thorax. It is formed by the junction of the right and left innominate veins, behind the junction of the first costal cartilage of the right side with the sternum, and descends nearly vertically to empty into the right auricle of the heart. It receives the pericardial and mediastinal veins and the large azygos vein. In vertebrates at large the two venæ cavae are distinguished as postcaval and precaval veins. See cuts under circulation, diaphragm, embryo, heart, lung, pancreas, and thorax.—Vena comites (pl. venæ comites), a companion vein; a satellite-vein; a vein, often one of a pair, which closely accompanies an artery in its course. The larger arteries have usually one, the smaller arteries two.—Vena contracta, in hydraul. See contracted vein, under contracted.—Venæ basis vertebrarum, the basivertebral veins; the veins of the body of each of the vertebrae. See venæ spinales, below.—Venæ comites, See vena comites, above.—Venæ cordis minimæ, the smallest cardiac veins (which see, under vein).—Venæ externæ, in Tuberales, peculiar white veins observed on a section of the sporophore, produced by the dense tissue containing air, which fills the ascleriferous chambers. De Bary.—Venæ Galeni, the veins of Galen; the veins of the cerebral ventricles, and especially one of the main trunks by which these veins empty into a venous sinus.—Venæ internæ, in Tuberales, dark-colored veins seen on a section of the sporophore, indicating the walls of the ascleriferous chambers, which are composed of tissue containing no air. De Bary.—Venæ lymphaticæ, same as venæ internæ.—Venæ spinales, the spinal veins; the many veins and venous plexuses in and on the spinal column, draining blood from the vertebral bones and spinal cord and its membranes. In man these veins are arranged and named in four sets—the basivertebral, dorsivertebral, medullary, and meningeal. All these veins are valveless, and form extensive and intricate anastomoses with one another.—Venæ vorticosa, ciliary veins: same as vasa vorticosa. See vas.—Vena lienalis, the splenic vein.—Vena porta, vena portæ, the portal vein. See portal, and cuts under circulation, liver, embryo, and pancreas.

Vena salvatella, the vein of the little finger, emptying into the superficial ulnar.

venada (ve-nā'dā), n. [Sp. venado, a deer, < L. venatus, hunting, the chase, game: see venatic, and cf. venison.] A small deer of Chili, Pudu humilis, the pudu.

venal (vē'nāl), a. [< OF. venal, F. vénal = Sp. Pg. venal = It. venale, < L. venalis, of or pertaining to selling, purchasable, < venus, also venum, sale, = Gr. ὄνος, price; cf. ὄνω, purchase, = Skt. vāna, price, wages, wealth; perhaps < √ vas, dwell, exist: see was. From L. venus are ult. E. vend, etc.] 1. Ready to sell one's services or influence for money or other valuable consideration, and entirely from sordid motives; bought or to be bought basely or meanly for personal gain; mercenary; hiring; used of persons: as, a venal politician.

Venal and licentious scribblers, with just sufficient talents to clothe the thoughts of a pandar in the style of a bellman, were now the favourite writers of the Sovereign and the public. Macaulay, Milton.

2. Characterized by or springing from venality; also, made a matter of sordid bargaining and selling: used of things.

Beasts are brought into the temple, and the temple itself is exposed to sale, and the holy rites, as well as the beasts of sacrifice, are made venal.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 103.

All my professions . . . might be ascribed to venal insincerity. Goldsmith, To Mrs. Lawder.

= Syn. Venal, Mercenary, Hireling. These words represent a person or thing as ready to be dishonorably employed for pay. Each is strongest in one sense. Venal is strongest in expressing the idea of complete sale to a purchaser—character, honor, principle, and even individuality being surrendered for value received, the venal man doing whatever his purchaser directs, a venal press advocating whatever it is told to advocate. Mercenary is strongest in expressing rapacity, or greed for gain, and activity. Hireling is strongest in expressing servility and consequent contempt, hire having become an ignoble word for pay: as, a hireling soldiery; a hireling defamer. A venal man sells his political or other support; a mercenary man sells his work, being chiefly anxious to get as much pay as possible; a hireling will do mean or base work as long as he is sure of his pay. Venal means a being ready to sell one's principles, whether he makes out to sell them or not; mercenary and hireling suggest more of actual employment.

venal (vē'nāl), a. [= Sp. Pg. venal, < NL. venalis, < L. vena, vein: see vein. Cf. venal.] Of or pertaining to the veins; venous: as, venal blood or circulation. [Obsolete.]

venality (vē-nāl'i-ti), n. [< OF. venalite, F. vénalité = Sp. venalidad = Pg. venalidade = It. venalità, < LL. venalita(t)-s, capability of being bought, < L. venalis, purchasable: see venal.] The state or character of being venal, or sordidly influenced by money or financial considerations; prostitution of talents, offices, or services for money or reward; mercenariness.

He preserved his independence in an age of venality.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xliii.

Infamous Venality, grown bold,

Writes on his bosom to be let or sold.

Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 416.

venall, n. See vennel.

venally (vē'nāl-i), adv. In a venal manner; mercenarily.

Venantest (vē-nan'tēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of venant(t)-s, ppr. of venari, hunt, chase: see venation.] The hunting-spiders, a group of spiders so called because, instead of weaving webs in which to lie in wait, they run or leap about to chase and catch their prey. See Mygalidae, Lycosidae, and cuts under bird-spider, Mygale, tarantula, and wolf-spider.

venary, n. An obsolete form of venery.

venary, 2<sup>d</sup> (ven'a-ri), a. [Irreg. < L. venari, hunt, chase: see venation. Cf. venery.] Of or pertaining to hunting. Howell.

venasquite (ven-as'kit), n. [< Venasque (see def.) + -ite.] In mineral., a variety of otterite, found at Venasque in the Spanish Pyrenees.

venatic (vē-nat'ik), a. [< L. venaticus, of or pertaining to hunting, < venatus, hunting, the chase, < venari, hunt, chase: see venation.] 1. Of or pertaining to hunting; used in hunting.

Newton's guess that the diamond was inflammable, and many instances which must occur to the reader, are of the true artsman kind; he did it by a sort of venatic sense. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 202.

2. Given to hunting; fond of the chase.

venatic (vē-nat'ik), n. Same as venatic.

venatical (vē-nat'ik-āl), a. [< venatic + -al.] Same as venatic.

There be three for Venary or Venatical Pleasure in England: viz., A Forest, a Chase, and a Park. Howell, Letters, iv. 16.

venatically (vē-nat'ik-āl-i), adv. In a venatic manner; in the chase.

several pyrand moths of the family Crumbidæ:

an old English collectors' name, given from the coloration, which suggests veneering. Crambus hortuabus is the garden veneer, C. pinellus the pearl veneer, and C. petronellus the common veneer. See cut under Crambidae.

veneer-press (vē-nēr'pres), n. A special form of press used to hold veneers in position while being glued to woodwork or furniture. Various complicated forms of screw-clamps and screw-presses are used, some being fitted with steam-pipes to keep the glue soft until the veneer has adapted itself to the irregular surface to which it is to be attached.

veneer-saw (vē-nēr'sā), n. A circular saw for cutting veneers from the solid wood, ivory, etc. It has a thin edge, and is thicker toward the center. E. H. Knight.

veneer-scraper (vē-nēr'skrā'pēr), n. A tool with an adjustable blade for dressing veneers. E. H. Knight.

venefical (vē-nef'i-kal), a. [L. veneficus, poisonous (see venefice), + -al.] Same as venefic. All with spindles, timbrels, rattles, or other venefical instruments, making a confused noise.

B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

veneficial (ven'ē-fish'al), a. [L. veneficium, a poisoning (see venefice), + -al.] 1. Acting by poison; sorcerous. [Rare.]

As for the magical virtues in this plant [the mistletoe], and conceived efficacy unto veneficial intentions, it seemeth a pagan relic derived from the ancient druids.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

2. Addicted to sorcery or poisoning.

veneficious (ven'ē-fish'us), a. [L. veneficium, a poisoning (see venefice), + -ous.] Same as venefice.

To sit cross-legged . . . was an old veneficious practice; and Juno is made in this posture to hinder the delivery of Alcmena.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 23.

veneficiously (ven'ē-fish'us-li), adv. By poison or witchcraft.

The intent hereof (breaking an egg-shell) was to prevent witchcraft; for, lest witches should draw or prick their names therein, and veneficiously mischief their persons, they broke the shell, as Delecampius hath observed.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 23.

veneism, n. An old spelling of venison.

venemoust, a. An obsolete spelling of venomous.

venenate (ven'ē-nāt), v. t. [L. venenatus, pp. of venenare, poison, < venenum, poison: see venom.] To poison; charge or infect with poison. [Rare.]

Poisoned jaws and venenated stings.

venenate (ven'ē-nāt), a. [L. venenatus, pp. of venenare.] Infected with poison; poisoned.

By giving this in fevers after calcination, whereby the venenate parts are carried off.

Woodward, On Fossils.

venenation (ven'ē-nā'shon), n. [L. venenate + -ion.] 1. The act of poisoning.—2. Poison or venom.

This venenation shoots from the eye; and this way a basilisk may im poison.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

venenet (vē-nēn'), a. [Irreg. (as adj.) < L. venenum, poison: see venom.] Poisonous; venomous.

Dry air opens the surface of the earth to disincarcerate venene bodies, or to evacuate them.

Harvey, On the Plague.

venenifluous (ven'ē-nif'lō-us), a. [L. venenum, poison, + fluere, flow: see fluent.] In hot, and zoöl., flowing with poisonous juice or venom: as, the venenifluous fang of a rattlesnake. See cuts under Crotalus and Viper.

Venenosa (ven'ē-nō'si), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. L. venenosus, full of poison: see venenose.] One of three sections into which serpents (Ophidia) have been divided, according as they are venomous or otherwise, the other sections being Innocua and Suspecta.

The definition of the group as having grooved fangs in the upper jaw, followed by smaller solid, hooked teeth, would make Venenosa nearly equivalent to the Proteroglypha; but if applied to poisonous snakes at large it would be equivalent to Proteroglypha and Solenoglypha together. It is discussed now, except as a convenient descriptive term, like Thanatophidia. Also called Noctu.

venenoset (ven'ē-nōs), a. [L. venenosus, poisonous: see venenose.] Full of venom; poisonous, as a serpent; belonging to the Venenosa; nocuous; thanatophidian.

Venetian (vē-nē'shan), a. and n. [Early mod. L. venetianus, a. venetia (det. 2. venetia); < OF. Venetian, F. Vénitien = It. Veneziano, < ME. Venetian, < Venetia, Venice, L. Venetia, the country of the Veneti, in the territory limited by Venice.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the city, province, or former republic of Venice, in northern Italy, on the edge of the Adriatic.

The land of the old Veneti bore the Venetian name ages before the city of Venice was in being.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 4.

A composition neither Byzantine nor Romanesque, unique in its style, and to be called Venetian.

The Venetian church building in Middle Ages, p. 13.

Venetian architecture, Venetian Gothic, the style of architecture elaborated in Venice between the twelfth and the early part of the sixteenth century. It combines in many respects the qualities of the arts of Byzantium, of the Italian mainland, and of transalpine Europe, but blends all these into a new style of high decorative quality and originality. The principal characteristics of this style are as follows: only story is usually graced with its own arched range of columns or pilasters, forming an open balcony or loggia, and separated from the other stories by conspicuous friezes or belts, often in the form of graceful balustrades; the arched windows are ornamented with small shafts at the sides, and their spandrels are often filled with rich carving; ornamental parapets are common; and the window-heads frequently show plain or pierced cusps of bold yet delicate outline and curves of great refinement. The most splendid example of the style is the famous Ducal Palace. Like all Italian pointed architecture—the so-called Italian Gothic—the merits of the style lie chiefly in external design; the Italians never sought to master the admirable theory of arched and vaulted construction securing stability by balance of opposed pressures, which was elaborated by northern medieval architects, and raises their architecture to the highest place in the history of the art. Venetian architecture is noteworthy for its lavish use of color derived from inlaid marbles, porphyries, and other stones of rich hue, as well as of gilding and brilliant mosaic and painted decoration. It bears witness in many subtle details to the close intercourse of the Venetians with the Orient.

Venetian blind, a blind made of slats of wood so connected as to overlap one another when closed, and to show a series of open spaces for the admission of light and air when opened. The term is applied especially to a hanging blind of which the slats are held together by strips of webbing or other flexible material. The pulling of a cord lifts the whole blind, the slats coming in contact with one another as they rise until all are packed closely together above the window. The pulling of another cord when the blind is down turns the slats to open or close them. In the British islands outside slatted shutters are also so called.—Venetian carpet. See carpet. Venetian chalk, same as French chalk (which see, under chalk).—Venetian embroidery, embroidery upon linen and similar materials, done by cutting away a great deal of the background so as to produce an open design like coarse lace, the edges of the stuff forming the pattern being stitched, and bars or brides sometimes used to steady and support the smaller leaves, etc.—Venetian enamel, an enamel used for clock- and watch-dials.—Venetian glass. See dial (with cut). Venetian lace. See rose-point, under point.—Venetian long-stitch embroidery, a simple kind of worsted work done upon open canvas.—Venetian mosaic. See mosaic.—Venetian pearl, the trade-name for solid artificial pearls. See artificial pearl under pearl. Venetian red. See red.—Venetian sailet, a form of sailet in which the neck and cheeks are protected by a long broad side-piece forged in one with the skull-piece, similar to the Greek helm with cheek-pieces and without crest.—Venetian school, in painting, the school of Italian painting which arose to prominence in Venice in the fifteenth century, with the Bellinis and Carpaccio, and was preeminent through a great part of the sixteenth century, when its chief masters were Titian, Paul Veronese, Giorgione, Tintoretto, Palma Vecchio, and Lorenzo Lotto. It was above all a school of colorists; in the magnificence of its use of pigments and in technical perfection it has never been surpassed; and in every artistic quality its chief masters will always rank with the first painters of the world.—Venetian sumac. See sumac. Venetian swell, in organ-building, a swell, or set of blinds, made after the pattern of Venetian blinds. See swell.—Venetian turpentine.

Venetian Architecture. An angle of the Ducal Palace.

See turpentine and larch.—Venetian window. See window.

II. n. 1. A native of Venice.—2t. [l. c.] pl. A particular fashion of hose or breeches reaching below the knee, originally brought from Venice; same as galligaus, l.

Item for a ell half of brod taffaty to make him a dublet and rendans 12 sh. Wardship of Rich. Fournor (1586).

3. A Venetian blind. [Colloq.]

There is not a single pane of glass in the town, badly closing venetians being the only means of shutting up the windows.

E. Sarrorius, In the Soudan, p. 102.

4. pl. A heavy kind of tape or braid made for Venetian blinds, to hold the slats in place.—5. Same as domino, 2.

I then put off my sword, and put on my Venetian or domino, and entered the bal masqué. The Century, XLII. 283.

Venetianed (vē-nē'shand), a. [< Venetian + -ed]. Furnished with Venetian blinds: as, a Venetianed window.

The bookcase stood immediately in front of a double venetianed door.

R. Hodgson, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 256.

veneur (vē-nēr'), n. [< OF. veneur, F. veneur (= Pr. venaire), < L. venator, a hunter, < venari, hunt; see venation]. A person charged with the care of the chase, especially with the hounds used in the chase. There were mounted veneurs, and those of inferior class on foot.—Grand veneur, an officer of the French court charged with the arrangements for the king's hunting; in later times, a great dignity of the royal household.

venewt, veneyt, n. Same as venet.

Venezuelan (vē-nē-zwē'lan), a. and n. [< Venezuela (see def.) + -an]. 1. a. Of or pertaining to Venezuela, a republic of South America, on the northern coast.

Guzman Blanco could not procure an audience with Lord Salisbury to protest against British seizures of Venezuelan territory at the north of the Orinoco.

Amer. Economist, III. 169.

Venezuelan ipecacuanha, a climbing plant of Venezuela. Philibertia (Sarcostemma) glauca.

II. n. An inhabitant of Venezuela.

venge (venj), v. t. [< ME. vengen, < OF. (and F.) venge = Sp. vengar, < L. vindicare, avenge, vindicate; see vindicate. Cf. aveng, fringe, vengeance]. 1. To avenge; take vengeance in behalf of (a person).

Right as they han *venge*d hem on me, right so shal I venge me upon hem.

Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.

I am coming on

To venge me as I may. Shak. Hen. V. i. 2. 292.

2. To revenge; take vengeance because of (an offense).

Would none but I might venge my cousin's death!

Shak., R. and J. iii. 5. 87.

vengeable (ven'jā-bl), a. [Early mod. E. also venigible; < OF. **vengeable* (= Sp. venigable); as venge + -able]. 1. Capable of being or deserving to be revenged.

I sought

Upon myselfe that vengeable designt

To punish. Spenser, F. Q., II. iv. 30.

2. Characterized by revengefulness; entertaining or displaying a desire for revenge; vengeful.

In mallice be not vengeable,

As S. Mathewe doth speake.

Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 92.

Alexander . . . dyd put to vengeable deth his dere frende Clitus.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 6.

3. Terrible; dreadful; awful; extraordinary; a hyperbolic use.

Paulus . . . was a vengeable fellow in linking matters together.

Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 78. (Davies.)

vengeably (ven'jā-bli), adv. Revengefully; in revenge.

Charitably, lovingly, not of malice, not vengeably, not covetously.

Latimer, 14th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1594.

vengeance (ven'jans), n. [< ME. vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, < OF. vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, < F. vengeance (= Sp. verganza = It. verganza), < venge, avenge; see venge]. 1. Punishment inflicted in return for an injury or an offense. Vengeance generally implies indignation on the part of the punisher, and more or less justice in the nature of the punishment; it may also be inflicted for wrong done to others, as well as to the punisher, in which respects it is usually distinguished from revenge.

Veniaunce, veniaunce forgiue be it neuere.

Piers Plowman (B.), xvii. 288.

Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.

Rom. xii. 19.

2t. Harm, mischief, or evil generally; formerly often used as an imprecation, especially in the phrase what a (the) vengeance!

Whiles the eye of man did woo me,

That could do no vengeance to me.

Shak., As you Like it. iv. 3. 48.

What the vengeance!
Could he not speak em fair?
Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 262.
But what a vengeance makes thee fly?
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. iii. 213.
With a vengeance, vehemently, violently; also, extremely. [Colloq.]
The fishy tune
That drove him [Asmodeus], though enamour'd, from the spouse
Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent From Media post to Egypt.
Milton, P. L. iv. 170.
Mandy However, try her: put it to her.
Verush. Ay, ay, I'll try her: put it to her home, with a Vengeance.
Wycherley, Plain Dealer, v. 1.
-Syn. 1. Retribution, Retaliation, etc. See revenge.
vengeance (ven'jans), adv. [Elliptical use of vengeance, n.] Extremely; very.
He's vengeance proud and loves not the common people.
Shak., Cor., ii. 2. 6.
I am vengeance cold, I tell thee
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, ii. 2.

vengeanceful (ven'jans-ful), adv. [vengeance + -ful.] With a vengeance; extremely; excessively.
I could poison him in a pot of perry;
He loves that vengeanceful.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, i. 3. vengeful (venj'ful), a. [venge + -ful.] Vindictive; retributive; revengeful.
I pray
His vengeful sword may fall upon thy head.
Fletcher (and another?), Love's Cure, v. 3.

vengefully (venj'ful-i), adv. In a vengeful manner; vindictively.
vengefulness (venj'ful-nes), n. Vindictiveness; revengefulness.
The two victims of his madness or of his vengefulness were removed to the London Hospital.
Daily Telegraph, June 22, 1886. (Encyc. Diet.)

vengement (venj'ment), n. [venge + -ment.] Avengement; retribution.
He shew'd his head their left,
And wretched life forlorn for vengeance of his theft.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. iii. 18.

vengeur (ven'jér), n. [F. vengeur = Sp. vengador, < LL. vindicator, avenger, < LL. vindicare, avenger; see venge. Cf. vindicator.] An avenger.
God is a vengeur of synne.
Coventry Mysteries, p. 76.
His bleeding heart is in the vengeurs hand.
Spenser, F. Q., I. iii. 20.

vengeress (ven'jér-es), n. [ME. vengeresse, < OF. vengeresse, fem. of vengeur, an avenger; see vengeur.] A female avenger.
This kynge alain was seke of the woundes of the spere vengeresse, . . . for he was wounded though both thyghes with that spere.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 229.

The three goddesses, furis and vengeressis of felonies.
Chaucer, Boethius, iii. meter 12.

veniable (vē-ni-a-bl), a. [ME. veniable, < LL. veniabilis, pardonable, < L. venia, pardon; see venial.] Venial; pardonable.
In things of this nature silence commendeth history;
'tis the veniable part of things lost.
Sir T. Broune, Vulg. Err., vii. 19.

venially (vē-ni-a-bli), adv. Pardonably; excusably.
venial (vē-ni-a), a. and n. [ME. venial, < OF. venial, F. veniel = Sp. Pg. venial = It. veniale, < LL. venialis, pardonable, < L. venia, indulgence, remission, pardon.] I. a. 1. That may be forgiven; pardonable; not very sinful or wrong; as, a venial sin or transgression. See sin<sup>1</sup>, 1.
There contritious doth but dryeth it down in to a venial synne.
Piers Plowman (B), xiv. 92.

In our own country, a woman forfeits her place in society by what in a man is too commonly considered as an honourable distinction, and at worst as a venial error.
Macaulay, Machiavelli.
2. Excusable; that may be allowed or permitted to pass without severe censure.
They are things indifferent, whether kept or broken;
Mere venial slips, that grow not near the conscience.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, ii. 1.
This is a mistake, though a very venial one; the apophthegm is attributed . . . to Agassius, not to Agassius.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 9, note.
3†. Permissible: harmless; unobjectionable.
Permitting him the while
Venial discourse unblinded.
Milton, P. L., ix. 5.

-Syn. 1 and 2. Venial, Excusable, Pardonable. Excusable and pardonable are applied to things small and great, but pardonable primarily applies to greater offenses, as pardoning is a more serious act than excusing. Excusable may be applied where the offense is only in seeming. Venial applies to things actually done; the others may apply to infirmities and the like. Venial, by theological use, is often opposed, more or less clearly, to mortal.
II.† n. A venial sin or offense.
It . . . gently blanches over the breaches of God's Law with the name of venials and favourable titles of diminution.
Ep. Hall, Dissuasive from Popery.

veniality (vē-ni-al'i-ti), n. [= Sp. venialidad = Pg. venialidade; as venial + -ity.] The property of being venial.
They palliate wickedness, with the fair pretence of veniality.
Ep. Hall, Sermon at Westminster, April 5, 1628.

venially (vē-ni-al-i), adv. In a venial manner; pardonably.

venialness (vē-ni-al-nes), n. The state of being excusable or pardonable.

Venice crown. In her., a bearing representing the corn or peaked cap of the Doge of Venice, decorated with a rim of gold like a coronet, surrounding the brow of the wearer.

Venice glass, mallow, point, soap, sumac, turpentine, white, etc. See glass, etc.

Venice treacle. See theriac.

Veni Creator (vē-ni kre-a'tor). [So called from the first words, "Veni Creator Spiritus," "Come, Creator Spirit." L. veni, 2d pers. sing. impv. of venire, come; creator, creator.] A hymn to the Holy Ghost, used in the Roman Catholic Church in the daily office on Whitsunday and during the octave, also at coronations, synods, ordination of priests, consecration of bishops, creation of popes, and translation of relics. In Sarum use it also formed part of the priest's preparation before mass. In the Anglican Prayer-book two free versions of it are given ("Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire" and "Come, Holy Ghost, eternal God"), to be used at the ordination of priests and consecration of bishops, and it is also used at synods, etc. Its authorship is commonly attributed to Charlemagne, but it is certainly older and may be referred with more probability to St. Gregory the Great. Also, more fully, Veni Creator Spiritus.

venim, venimet, n. Old spellings of venom.
venimouset, a. An obsolete form of venomous.

veniplexed (vē-ni-plekst), a. [veniplex + -ed.] Formed into a venous plexus or network. Cours.

venire facias (vē-ni-rē fā'si-as), [So called from these words in the writ, lit. 'cause to come.' L. venire, come; facias, 2d pers. sing. pres. subj. (as impv.) of facere, make, do, cause.] In law, a writ or precept directed to the sheriff, requiring him to cause a jury or a number of jurors to come or appear in court, for the trial of causes. Also, in common legal parlance, venire.—Venire facias de novo, or venire de novo, in law, a new writ for summoning a jury anew; the process used at common law when, by reason of some irregularity or defect apparent on the record, a party was entitled to a new trial as matter of right. The motion for a new trial in modern practice may be made on the same grounds, and also on other grounds, including some that rest in judicial discretion.

venire-man (vē-ni-rē-man), n. A man summoned under a venire facias for jury service.

venison (ven'zn or ven'i-zn), n. [Formerly also ven'son; < ME. venison, venysoun, veneson, veneisun, < *OF. *rencisun*, venaison, venoison, F. venaison, venison, the flesh of the deer and boar, the principal objects of the chase, < L. venatio (n-), hunting, also the product of the chase, game, < venari, hunt: see venation<sup>1</sup>, of which venison is thus a doublet. For the form and the dissyllabic pronunciation, cf. menison, menson, ult. < L. manatio (n-).] 1†. A beast or beasts of the chase, as deer and other large game.
A thief of venysoun, that hath forlapt
His likeliness and al his olde craft,
Can kepe a forest best of any man.
Chaucer, Physician's Tale, I. 83.

"Come, kill [me] a ven'son," said bold Robin Hood,
"Come, kill me a good fat deer."
Robin Hood and the Bishop of Hereford (Child's Ballads, [V. 294].)

2. The flesh of such game used as food; specifically, the flesh of animals of the deer tribe: now the common use of the word.
Shall we go and kill us venison?
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 1. 21.

A fair ven'son pastye brought she out presently.
King and Miller of Mansfield (Child's Ballads, VIII. 36).
Thanks, my Lord, for your venison, for finer or fatter Never rang'd in a forest or smok'd in a platter.
Goldsmith, Haunch of Venison.

Fallow venison, the flesh of the fallow deer.—Red venison, the flesh of the red deer.
Venison both red and fallow.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, I. v. § 2.

Venite (vē-ni'tē), n. [So called from the first words, "Venite exultemus." "O come, let us sing unto the Lord." L. venite, 2d pers. pl. impv. of venire, come.] 1. In liturgies, the 95th Psalm. In the Roman and other Western arrangements of the daily office this psalm is said at matins, accompanied by the invitatory and followed, after a hymn, by the appointed psalms of the hour. In the Anglican Prayer-book it is also said daily at matins or morning prayer before the psalms of the Psalter, except on the nineteenth day of the month, when it begins the portion for the day in the Psalter, and at Easter, when it is replaced by a special anthem. Also, more fully, Venite exultemus.

2. A musical setting, usually in chant form, of the above sentence.

venivel, venivela (ven'i-vel, ven-i-vē'lī), n. [E. Ind.] The velvetleaf, or spurious pareira brava, Cissampelos Parviflora.

venjet, v. An old spelling of venge.

vennel (ven'el), n. [Formerly also venall; < F. venelle, a small street.] An alley, or narrow street. [Scotch.]

Some ruins remain in the vennel of the Maison Dieu or hospitiun, founded by William of Brechin in 1256.
Encyc. Brit., IV. 242.

venom (ven'um), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also venome, venim, venime, venym; < ME. venim, venym, venyma, venum, < OF. venim, venim, also velin, F. venin = Pr. vere, veri = Sp. Pg. veneno = It. veleno, veneno, < L. venenum, poison.] I. n. 1. Poison in general: now an archaic use.
Zif Venym or Poysoun be broughte in presence of the Dyamand, anon it begynneth to wexe inoyst and for to swete.
Manderly, Travels, p. 159.
Full from the fount of Joy's delicious springs
Some bitter o'er the flowers its bubbling venom flings.
Byron, Child Harold, i. 82.

2. The poisonous fluid secreted by some animals in a state of health, as a means of offense and defense, and introduced into the bodies of their victims by biting, as in the case of many serpents, or stinging, as in the case of scorpions, etc. In vertebrates venom is usually a modified saliva secreted by glands morphologically identical with ordinary salivary glands; and the normal saliva of various animals acquires at times, or under some circumstances, an extremely venomous quality, as in the rabies of various beasts. Venom is normal to few vertebrates, notably all thanatophidian serpents, and one or two lizards, as the Gila monster. Venom-glands are connected with the spines of the head or fins of a few fishes. Venom of extreme virulence is injected with the bite of a few spiders (see Latrodectus, and cut under spider), and the punctures made by the claws or telson of centipeds and scorpions are envenomed. An acrid or irritating fluid, classable as venom, is injected with the sting of many insects (see cases cited under sting), and in one case at least may be fatal to large animals (see testes).
Of alle fretynge venymes the vilest is the scorpion;
May no medecyne amende the place ther he syngeth.
Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 158.
Or hurtful worm with canker'd venom bites.
Milton, Arcades, l. 53.

3. Something that blights, cankers, or embitters; injurious influence; hence, spite; malice; malignity; virulence.
What with Venus, and other oppressioun
Of houses, Mars his Venim is adoun,
That Ypermistra dar nat handle a knyf.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2593.
The venom of such looks, we fairly hope,
Have lost their quality. Shak., Hen. V., v. 2. 18.

4†. Coloring material; dye.
They cowde nat medle the bryhte fleeces of the coudre of Seryens with the venym of Tyrie.
Chaucer, Boethius, ii. meter 5.

II.† a. Envenomed; venomous; poisonous.
In our lande groweth pepper in forestis full of snakes and other venym beastes.
R. Eden (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. xxxiv.).
Thou art . . .
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided,
As venom toads, or lizard's dreadful stings.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2. 138.
My venom eyes
Strike innocency dead at such a distance.
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, v. 2.

venom (ven'um), v. [Early mod. E. venome, venime; < ME. venymen, venymen, by aphesis from envenimen, < OF. envenimer, poison (see envenom); in part directly from the noun venom.] I. trans. To envenom; infect with poison.
The venomed vengeance ride upon our swords.
Shak., T. and C., v. 3. 47.
Here boldly spread thy hands, no venom'd weed
Dares blister them.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, iii. 1.
Since I must
Through Brothers' perierie dye, O let me venome
Their Soules with curses!
Tourneur, Revenger's Tragedy, iii. 4.
Its bite [that of Conus aulicus] produces a venomed wound accompanied by acute pain.
A. Adams, quoted in Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 336.

II.† intrans. To become as if infected with venom.
Take out the temporal sting, that it shall not venom and fester. Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium. (Latham.)

venom-albumin (ven'um-al-bū'min), n. The albumin of snake-poison.

venom-duct (ven'um-dukt), n. The duct which conveys venom from the sac or gland where it venous duct

or branching network; veiny: as, a venose or veiny coat. 2. In anat., and anat., same.

venose costate (vē'nōs-kōst'at), a. In bot., having a pinnate leaf-vein, having raised veins approaching ribs.

venosity (vē'nōs-i-tē), n. [venose + -ity.] 1. Venose state, quality, or character.—2. A condition in which the arterial blood is imperfectly oxygenated, and partakes of some of the characteristics of venous blood.

A pathological condition of the blood. Science, VII. 533.

3. A disturbance of equilibrium between the two circulatory systems, the veins being unduly filled at the expense of the arteries; general venous congestion.

venous (vē'nus), a. [L. venosus, full of veins, < vena, vein; see rein. Cf. venose, veinous.] 1. Of or pertaining to veins; full of veins; containing veins; vened; venose: as, the venous system; venous blood or circulation; a venous plexus, sinus, or radicle.—2. In entom., having veins or nervures; venose or veined, as an insect's wing.

Venous blood, the blood contained in the veins of the body of the heart. It is of a dark-red color, and contains carbonic acid and other waste and nutritive products, which vary in kind and amount in different regions of the body. The venous blood is driven from the right auricle into the right ventricle of the heart, thence through the pulmonary artery into the lungs, where it is oxygenated and purified and returned through the pulmonary veins to the left auricle of the heart. In the fetus venous blood passes from the hypogastric arteries along the umbilical arteries, and so on to the placenta, where it is arterialized and returned by the umbilical vein or veins; and there is a direct communication between the right and left auricles of the heart.—Venous calculus. Same as calculi. Venous canal (ductus venosus), a fetal vein passing from the point of bifurcation of the umbilical vein to the inferior vena cava. It becomes obliterated soon after birth, and then remains as a fibrous cord.

Venous circulation, the flow of blood through the veins. See circulation of the blood, under circulation.

Venous congestion or hyperemia, engorgement of the veins of a part, due to obstruction of the venous circulation. Venous hyperemia is more strictly the engorgement of the subcutaneous veins, or superficial venous congestion. Venous duct. See ductus venosus, under ductus. Venous hemorrhage, bleeding from a vein. It is distinguished from arterial hemorrhage by the darker color of the blood and by the fact that it occurs in a steady stream, and not in forcible jets, as when an artery is opened.—Venous hum. See hum. Venous plexus. See plexus. Venous pulse, a pulsation occurring in a vein, especially that which exists normally in the jugular veins.

Venous radicles, the first beginnings of the venous system, continuous with the capillaries. Sometimes erroneously written venous radicles. Venous sinus. (a) One of the various large veins formed in the substance of the dura mater. See the distinctive names under sinus. (b) A natural dilatation of a vein, or a cavity into which two or more veins empty in common. In different cases such a sinus may correspond to the auricle of a heart, to a cavity communicating with a heart, as a caval vein, or to a cavity inclosing a heart, as the so-called pericardium of some invertebrates.

venously (vē'nus-li), adv. In a venous manner; as respects the veins or venous circulation.

The membranes of the brain were venously congested. Lancet, 1899, I. 751.

vent<sup>1</sup> (vent), n. [Early mod. E. vente; an altered form of vent, < ME. vente, < OF. vente, a slit, cleft, chink; see fiat.] The alteration of fiat to vent was not due to the dial. change shown in vat for fat, vizen for fixen, etc., but to confusion with F. vent, wind (see vent<sup>2</sup>), as if orig. 'an air-hole.' A similar confusion appears in the history of vent<sup>2</sup> and vent<sup>3</sup>, which have been more or less mixed with each other and with vent<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A small aperture leading out of or into some inclosed space; any small hole or opening made for passage.

Through little vents and crannies of the place
The wind was with his torch. Shak., Lucrece, I. 310.

Now he flings about his burning heat,
As in a furnace an ambitious fire
Whose vent is stopt. B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 2.

Great Builder of mankind, why hast thou sent Such swelling floods, and made so small a vent?
Quarles, Emblems, iii. 8.

Between the jaw and ear the jav'lin went;
The soul, exhaling, issu'd at the vent.
Pope, Iliad, xvi. 738.

2. Specifically—(a) The small opening into the barrel of a gun, by which the priming comes in contact with the charge, or by which fire is communicated to the charge; a touch-hole. (b) The opening in the top of a barrel to allow air to pass in as the liquid is drawn out; also, the vent-peg with which the opening is stopped.

If you are sent down in haste to draw any drink, and find it will not run, do not be at the trouble of opening a vent, but blow strongly into the fosses.

Swift, Directions to Servants (Butler). (c) A hollow gunlet used to make an opening in a cork or barrel, in order to draw out a small quantity of liquid for sampling; a liquid-vent or vent-faucet. (d) In molding, one of the channels or passages by which the gases escape from the mold. (e) The flue or funnel of a chimney. (f) A crenelle or loophole in an embattled wall. Orford Glossary. (g) In steam-boilers, the sectional area of the passage for gases, divided by the length of the same passage in feet. Webster. (h) In musical instruments of the wood wind group, a finger-hole. (i) The end of the intestine, especially in animals below mammals, in which the posterior orifice of the alimentary canal discharges the products of the urogenital organs as well as the refuse of digestion, as the anus of a bird or reptile; also, the anal pore of a fish, which, when distinct from the termination of the intestine, discharges only the milt or roe. See cut under Terebratulidæ.—3. A slit or opening in a garment.

Item, j. jaket of red felwet, the ventis bounde with red lether. Paston Letters, I. 476.

The collar and the vente. Assembly of Ladies, lxxvi.

4. An escape from confinement, as for something pent up; an outlet.

My tears, like ruffling winds lock'd up in caves,
Do bustle for a vent. Ford, Lover's Melancholy, v. 1.

This is mischief without remedy, a stifling and obstructing evil that hath no vent, no outlet, no passage through. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvii.

5. Utterance; expression; voice.

Free vent of words love's fire doth assuage.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 334.

Madam, you seem to stifle your Resentment: You had better give it vent. Congreve, Way of the World, v. 13.

The poor little Jackdaw,
When the monks he saw,
Feebly gave vent to the ghost of a caw.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 212.

6†. A discharge; an emission.

Here on her breast
There is a vent of blood.
Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 352.

To give vent to, to suffer to escape or break out; keep no longer pent up; as, to give vent to anger. To serve the vent. See serve.—To take vent, to become known; get abroad.

Whereby the particular design took vent beforehand.
Sir H. Watton.

vent<sup>1</sup> (vent), v. t. [vent<sup>1</sup>, n.] 1. To let out at a vent; make an opening or outlet for; give passage to; emit; let pass.

How earnest thou to be the siege of this moon-calf? can he vent Trinculos? Shak., Tempest, ii. 2. 111.

He vented a sigh e'en now, I thought he would have blown up the church.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iii. 1.

2. To furnish with a vent; make a vent in.

The gun is then vented. Ure, Dict., IV. 82.

It is usually necessary to vent the punch by a small hole. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXII. 331.

3. To give utterance, expression, or publicity to; especially, to report; publish; promulgate; hence, to circulate.

In his brain
He hath strange places cramm'd
With observation, the which he vents
In mangled forms. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 41.

Let rash report run on; the breath that vents it Will, like a bubble, break itself at last.

Ford, Tis Pity, iv. 1.

After many speeches to and fro, at last she was so full as she could not contain, but vented her revelations.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 294.

And when mens discontents grow ripe there seldom wants a plausible occasion to vent them.

Stillington, Sermons, II. iv.

As children of weak age
Lend life to the dumb stones
Whereon to vent their rage.

M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna, i.

4. Reflexively, to free one's self; relieve one's self by giving vent to something.

Adams frequently vented himself in ejaculations during their journey. Fielding, Joseph Andrews, ii. 10.

vent<sup>2</sup> (vent), n. [OF. vent, wind, air, breath, scent, smell, vapor, puff, = Sp. viento = *Pg. The Otter . . . you may now see above water at vent, and the dogs close with him.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 59.

vent<sup>2</sup> (vent), v. [< F. ventiler, blow, puff (as the wind), < vent, the wind: see vent<sup>1</sup>, n., and cf. vent<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. † trans. To scent, as a hound; smell; snuff up; wind.

I have seen the houndes passe by such a hart within a yerd of him and never vent him. . . . When he smellth or venteth anything we say he hath this or that in the wind.

Turbo Redde.

Bearing his nostrils up into the wind,
A sweet fresh feeding thought that he did vent.

Drayton, Moonecalf.

To vent up, to lift so as to give air.

But the brave Mayd would not disarm'd bee,
But only vented up her umbriere,
And so did let her goodly visage to appeere.

Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 42.

II. intrans. 1. To open or expand the nostrils to the air; sniff; snuff; snort.

After the manner of a drunkeard, that venteth for the best wine. Guanaco, Letters (tr. by Helwyses, 1577), p. 344.
See how he venteth into the wind.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., February.

2. In hunting, to take breath or air.

Now have at him [an otter] with Kilbuck, for he vents again.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 59.

When the otter vents or comes to the surface to breathe.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 306.

3. To draw, as a chimney, or a house, room, etc., by means of a chimney.

Forbye the ghaist, the Green Room disna vent weel in a high wind.

An order was taken that from henceforth no printer shall print or put to vent any English book but such as shall first be examined by Mr. Secretary Petre, Mr. Secretary Smith, and Mr. Cecil, or the one of them, and allowed by the same. . . . 15th August, 1549.

M.S. Priory Combed Book, quoted in R. W. Dixon's Hist. [Church of Eng., xvi., note.]

The vent of ten millions of pounds of this commodity, now locked up by the operation of an injudicious tax, and rotting in the warehouses of the company, would have prevented all this distress.

Burke, Amer. Taxation.

2. Opportunity to sell; market.

We be uncertaine what vent or sale you shall finde in Persia.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 342.

Pepper . . . grows here very well, and might be had in great plenty, if it had any vent.

R. Knox (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 336).

There is in a manner no vent for any commodity except wool.

vent<sup>4</sup> (vent), v. t. [< vent<sup>3</sup>, n. (Cf. vent<sup>1</sup>, v.)] To vend; sell.

Whereas other English Marchants in one small Towne of Germania vent 60 or 80 thousand clothes yearly.

G. Fletcher, quoted in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 83.

Familiar with the prices

Of oil and corn, with when and where to vent them.

Massinger, Great Duke of Florence, II. 2.

vent<sup>4</sup> (vent), n. [< Sp. venta, an inn, prop. a market or place of sale: see vent<sup>3</sup>.] An inn.

Our house

Is but a vent of need, that now and then
Receives a guest, between the greater towns,
As they come late.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, I. 1.

ventriloquism (ven-tril'ō-kwiz-m), n. [< ventriloquy + -ism.] The act, art, or practice of speaking or uttering sounds in such a manner that the voice appears to come, not from the person speaking, but from a distance, as from the opposite side of the room or from the cellar. Ventriloquism differs from ordinary speaking mainly in the mode of respiration. A very full inspiration is taken, which is breathed out slowly and gradually, the sound of the voice being dexterously modified and diminished by the muscles of the larynx and the palate. At the same time the lips of the performer are scarcely moved, and the deception is still further facilitated by the attention of the auditors being directed to the pretended source of the voice. Ventriloquism was known to the ancient Greeks as well as to the Romans.

What is called ventriloquism, . . . and is not uncommonly ascribed to a mysterious power of producing voice somewhere else than in the larynx, depends entirely upon the accuracy with which the performer can simulate sounds of a particular character, and upon the skill with which he can suggest a belief in the existence of the causes of these sounds. Thus, if the ventriloquist desire to create the belief that a voice issues from the bowels of the earth, he imitates, with great accuracy, the tones of such a half-stifled voice, and suggests the existence of some one uttering it by directing his answers and gestures towards the ground. The gestures and tones are such as would be produced by a given cause; and, no other cause being apparent, the mind of the bystander insensibly judges the suggested cause to exist. Huxley.

ventriloquist (ven-tril'ō-kwist), n. [As ventriloquy + -ist.] One who practises or is skilled in ventriloquism; one who speaks in such a manner that his voice appears to come from some distant place or other quarter.

I regard truth as a divine ventriloquist: I care not from whose mouth the sounds are supposed to proceed, if only the words are audible and intelligible.

ventriloquistic (ven-tril'ō-kwis'tik), a. [< ventriloquist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to ventriloquism or ventriloquists; ventriloquial. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 72.

2. The Venus of Melos, in the Louvre Museum.

the arms are broken off; the figure and face are at once graceful and beautiful, and highly imposing. The type is that of the Victrix. The Venus of the Capitol, in the Capitoline Museum at Rome, undraped, and in attitude and motive very similar to the Venus of Medici, though the Capitoline statue displays a more personal element, and comes closer to the living model. Of the modern statues representing Venus there may be mentioned the Venus Borghese, a celebrated statue by Canova, in the Villa Borghese at Rome. The statue represents the Princess Pauline (Bonaparte) Borghese in the character of Venus Genetrix. The figure is shown reclining, extending the apple in one hand, the head being a close portrait. See Aphrodite.

2. The most brilliant of the planets, being frequently visible to the naked eye by daylight. It is the second from the sun and next within the earth's orbit, performing its sidereal revolution in 224.7008 days; its distance from the sun is 0.723332 that of the earth. The synodical revolution is found in 584 days. Its orbit is the most nearly circular of those of the major planets, the greatest equation of the center being only 47' 3". The inclination of the orbit to the ecliptic is 3° 23' 56"; and the earth passes through the ascending node on December 7th. The mass of Venus (which is not very closely ascertained) is about  $\frac{1}{4}$  that of the sun, or  $\frac{1}{11}$  that of the earth. Its diameter is a little smaller than that of our planet, which subtends an angle of  $2 \times 8''.827$  at the sun's center, while Venus at the same distance has a semidiameter of  $8''.68$  by the mean of the best night measures, or  $8''.40$  according to the observations at its transit over the sun. Taking the mean of these (which are affected in opposite ways by irradiation), or  $8''.54$ , we find the diameter of Venus about  $\frac{1}{3}$  that of the earth. Its volume is about  $\frac{1}{10}$  its density about  $\frac{1}{2}$  and gravity at its surface about  $\frac{1}{2}$  the same quantities for the earth. It receives 1.9 as much light and heat from the sun as we, and the tidal action of the latter is about 5.3 times as great as upon the earth. The period of rotation of Venus is set down in many books as 23 hours and 50 minutes; but recent observations have led some astronomers to the confident conclusion that the true period falls short but a little of 225 days, so that day and night last for many years. The old figure was deduced chiefly from the observation that a spot appeared nearly in the same place night after night, so that it seemed as if Venus had made one complete revolution; whereas it now appears that there is in one day no sensible motion. The vast tidal action may account for the near approach of the periods of rotation and revolution. Venus has an atmosphere nearly twice as dense as our own, and we may safely infer that all its water is in the form of dry steam; for the dense atmosphere must cause a greater proportion of the heat to be retained. Probably nearly all the carbon is in the form of carbonic anhydride or carbonate, leaving little or no free oxygen. Geological erosion can hardly be great. The mountains of Venus are shown to be high by the form of the terminator. Still, Venus reflects a great amount of light (its albedo being 0.9 that of Jupiter, which is perhaps self-luminous), and much of this appears to come from general specular reflection, as from polished level surfaces, possibly melted metals. The night side of Venus, which must be intensely cold, shows a faint coppery-red light, which is somewhat fitful in its appearances, and is probably of the nature of an intense aurora. No satellite of Venus has ever been seen. Numerous observations of one were reported in the eighteenth century; but all these have been fairly shown to be fixed stars, except one, which was probably an asteroid. The symbol for Venus is  $\text{♀}$ , supposed to represent the goddess's mirror.

31. Sexual intercourse; venery. Bacon.—41. In old chese, copper.—5. In her, green; the name given to that color when blazing is done by means of the planets. See blazon, n.—6. In cock: a. The typical genus of bivalve shells of the family Veneridae: so called by Linnæus with allusion to the shape of the lunule of the closed valves. See cuts under Veneridae, quahog, and dumprarian. (b) [l. c.] A shell of the genus Levis; any venerid.

The most admired example is in the Museo Pio Clementino in the Vatican.—Venus Anadyomene (marine Venus, or Venus of the Sea), Venus represented as born or rising from the foam of the sea. In art the type has marine attributes, as the dolphin, and is represented undraped. The Venus of Medici is an example.—Venus Callipyge or Kallipygos, a type wrongly attributed to Venus, the subject represented being essentially mortal. One of the best-known statues of this type is in the Museum at Naples.—Venus Genetrix, in art, etc., Venus as the goddess of fecundity. The type presents the goddess undraped, partially draped, or clad in a diaphanous Ionic tunic, with one hand raising the drapery toward her face from the shoulder according to the conventional Greek gesture of marriage, and with the other extending an apple.—Venus of Cnidus, the undraped type of Venus created by Praxiteles, and dedicated in the temple in Cnidus, paralleled with the draped type of the same master, that of Coa. According to tradition, the beautiful Phryne was the model for this statue. The most instructive copies accessible are one in the Vatican (as exhibited, partly masked by painted drapery of tin), and one in the Glyptothek at Munich. The Venus of Medici is generally held to be a free copy of this type. See cut under Aphrodite.—Venus of the rock, in conch, a boring bivalve mollusk of the genus Venerupis. It bears a golden-yellow fruit of the size of a nutmeg, resembling a lime.—Venus's hair, a delicate little fern, Adiantum Capillus-Veneris: so called from the blackish, shining capillary branches of the rachis. It has ovate-lanceolate bipinnate fronds, or the upper part simply pinnate, with pinules and upper pinne wedge-shaped or rhomboid, long-stalked, the upper margin rounded, and more or less incised or crenate. It is cosmopolitan in distribution.—Venus's hair-stones, Venus's pencils, fanciful names applied to rock-crystals inclosing slender hair-like or needle-like crystals of hornblende, asbestos, oxid of iron, rutile, oxid of manganese, etc.—Venus's looking-glass, a plant of the genus Specularia, primarily S. speculum.—Venus's pencils. Numerous genera of such lamellibranchs are named from the same appearance. See cuts under Cytherea, Venerupis, and Venus. (b) One of various Cypræideæ or cowries. (c) Venus's comb; a murex. (d) Venus's slipper. (1) A heteropod, the glass-nautilus. See cut under Carinaria. (2) A pteropod of the family Cymbulidæ. See cut under Cymbulium.—Venus's sumac. See sumac, and cut under smoke-tree.—Venus Urania, or Celestial Venus, Venus as the goddess of divine love, or of love in its abstract and spiritual phase. She is a goddess of noble and majestic type, akin to that of Venus Victrix, and approaching the conception of Juno.—Venus Victrix, Venus victorious, or in the character of a goddess of victory. This type appears associated with the war-god Mars, and is illustrated notably on Roman imperial coins. The goddess is represented with arms and other attributes of war.—Venus with the Apple. See Venus Genetrix.—Warty venus, a bivalve mollusk, Venus verrucosa. The valves have concentric ridges opening backward, and toward the sides or ends becoming coarser and forming knots or tubercles (whence the name). These are diversified by fine ribs or furrows radiating from the beaks. The mollusk is common along the European coasts, and chiefly affects rocky bottoms about low-water mark, but is also found on sand-banks. It is extensively used as food, and has been made the object of a special culture in France.

Venusidæ (ve-nu'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Venus + -idæ.] Same as Veneridæ.

Venus's-comb (vē'nus-ez-kōm), n. 1. The plant Scandix Pecten. Also called lady's-comb, shepherd's-needle, and needle cherrie.—2. The thorny woodcock, Murex tribulus or M. tenuispinus, a beautiful and delicate shell with long slender spines, found in the Indian Ocean. See cut under murex.

Venus's-navelwort (vē'nus-ez-nā'vel-wért), n. See nardwort.

Venus's-needle† (vē'nus-ez-nē dl), n. Same as Venus's-comb, 1.

Venus's-pride (vē'nus-ez-prīd), n. The bluet, Houstonia caribæa, otherwise called innocence, Quaker ladies, Quaker bonnets, etc.

Venus's-shoe (vē'nus-ez-shō), n. Same as Venus's-slipper, 2.

Venus's-slipper (vē'nus-ez-slip'ēr), n. 1. See Venus's-shell (d) (under Venus) and slipper<sup>2</sup>.—2. Any plant of the genus Cypripedium.

venust (vē-nust'), a. [L. venustus, charming, agreeable, < Venus, the goddess of love and beauty; see Venus.] Beautiful; amiable.

As the infancy of Rome was venust, so was its manhood nobly stentrous.

Waterhouse, Com. on Fortescue, p. 187. (Latham.)

ver, n. [ME. ver, veer, vere, < (OF. ver, < L. ver, spring, Gr. ῥαπ, ῥαπ, spring. Cf. vernal.] The spring.

Averil, when clothed is the mede
With new grene, of lusty veer the prime.
Chaucer, Troilus, l. 157.

veracious (vē-rā'shus), a. [L. verax (verax), speaking truly, truthful, < verus, true, real; see very.] 1. Truthful; habitually disposed to speak truth; observant of truth.

The Spirit is most perfectly and absolutely veracious.
Barrow, Sermons, II. xxiv. (Latham.)

2. Characterized by truth; true; not false; as, a veracious account or narrative.

The young ardent soul that enters on this world with heroic purpose, with veracious insight, . . . will find [it] a very mad one.
Carlyle, Sterling, v.

veraciously (vē-rā'shus-ly), adv. In a veracious manner; truthfully.

veracity (vē-ras'i-ti), n. [OF. veracitē, F. veracité = Sp. veracidad = Pg. veracidade = It. veracità, < ML. veracitas (-s), truthfulness, < L. verax (verax), truthful; see veracious.] 1. The fact or character of being veracious or true. Specifically—(a) Habitual regard to or observance of truth; truthfulness; truth: as, a man of veracity.

Let veracity be thy virtue, in words, manners, and actions.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 20.

Another form of virtue which usually increases with civilisation is veracity, a term which must be regarded as including something more than the simple avoidance of direct falsehood.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 143.

(b) Consistency with truth; agreement with actual fact: as, the veracity of the senses.

In narratives, where historical veracity has no place, I cannot discover why there must be exhibited the most perfect idea of virtue.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 4.

That enthusiasm for truth, that fanaticism of veracity, which is a greater possession than most learning; a nobler gift than the power of increasing knowledge.
Huxley, Universities.

2. That which is true; that in which truth inheres; also, abstract truth.—Principle of veracity. (a) The proposition that man has a natural inclination or propensity toward speaking the truth. (b) The proposition that God's veracity requires us to accept without doubt a given wide-spread belief. This was urged by the English Platonists and others. (c) The proposition that innate beliefs must be accepted on account of the veracity of consciousness.—Veracity of consciousness, the conformity of natural beliefs to the truth.

veranda (vē-ran'dā), n. [Also verandah, formerly also veranda, veranda, verandah; cf. F. véranda = Sw. Dan. veranda (< E.); < Hind. varanda, Beng. baranda, Malay baranda, late Skt. varanda, a veranda, portico; supposed by some to be derived from Pers. barāmadah, a porch, terrace, balcony (< barāmadān, ascend, < bar, up, + āmadān, come, arrive), but perhaps from the similar OPg. and OSP. terms (which are found too early to be derived from the Hind. word), namely OPg. varanda (1498), OSP. varanda (1505), a balcony, railing (Yule), "railes to leane the breast on" (Percival; so Minshew), < vara, a rod, < L. vara, a rod, stick; see vare.] An open portico, or a light gallery attached to the exterior of a building, with a roof supported on pillars, and a balustrade or railing, and sometimes partly inclosed in front with lattice-work. By a popular but erroneous usage, often called piazza in the United States.

veratrate (vē-rā'trāt), n. [Veratr(ic) + -ate.] In chem., a salt of veratric acid.

Veratrea (vē-rā'trē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Salisbury, 1812), < Veratrum + -ea.] A tribe of liliaceous, sometimes bulbous, plants, characterized by a tall leafy stem, or with most of the leaves radical, and by panicle or racemed and chiefly polygamous flowers with confluent and finally orbicular-peltate anther-cells. The 33 species are classed in 6 genera, of which Schenocaulon, Amianthum, Melanthium, and Zygadenus are confined to America; the others, Stenanthium and Veratrum (the type), occur also in the north of the Old World. They bear purple, greenish, or white flowers, followed by septical pedicels.

veratric (vē-rā'trik), a. [Veratr(um) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to veratrine or the genus Veratrum.—Veratric acid, C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>10</sub>O<sub>4</sub>, the acid with which veratrine exists combined in Schenocaulon officinale. It crystallizes in short white transparent prisms, which are soluble in water and alcohol, and forms crystallizable salts with the alkalis, which are called veratrates. It has sometimes been called evadit, evaditite, or subaditit acid.

veratrine (vē-rā'trin), n. [Veratr(um) + -ine.] An alkaloid, or a mixture of alkaloids, derived from several species of Veratrum and from evadilla. It is an exceedingly poisonous substance, used chiefly in medicine, in the form of ointment, as an application for the relief of neuralgia.—Oleate of veratrine. See oleate.

veratrise (vē-rā'triz), v. t.; pret. and pp. veratrise, ppr. veratrising. [Veratr(ine) + -ize.] To give veratrine to in sufficient dose to produce its physiological effects; poison with veratrine: a procedure employed sometimes in physiological experiments upon animals.

veratroidine (vē-rā'troi'din), n. [Veratr(um) + -oid + -ine.] An alkaloid, supposed to be identical with rubijervine, obtained from Veratrum viride.

Veratrum (vē-rā'trum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier by Lobel, 1576), < L. veratrum, hellebore.] A genus of liliaceous plants, type of the tribe Veratrea. It is characterized by stems clad with numerous broad plicate leaves contracted into a sheathing base. There are 9 species, four of which are natives of Europe and Siberia, the others of North America. They are tall, erect, robust perennials, growing from a thick rootstock with somewhat fleshy fasciated root-fibers. The flowers are purplish, green, or white, very abundant, in a terminal panicle, and followed by erect or reflexed capsules separated into three carpels. The species are known in general as white hellebore, especially V. album and V. nigrum of Europe, and V. viride of North America, species respectively with whitish, blackish, and green flowers; their rootstocks are powerfully emetic and cathartic, and are collected in quantities for medicinal use—V. album in Germany, and V. viride in North Carolina. Both are very acrid, occasioning excessive irritation of the digestive tract. V. album has also been known as lingwort, and, from its effect as an emetic, as sneezewort; it is chiefly subalpine, and occurs from Europe to Japan; its roots furnish the alkaloids veratrine, jervine, rubijervine, and others, also evadit acid. A poisonous gray powder prepared from it is used to destroy caterpillars; the fresh leaves are, however, freely eaten by slugs and snails. V. viride, the principal American species, known also as Indian poke, and locally as itchweed, bugbane, and earth-gull, is widely distributed in and near mountain regions from Georgia into Canada and from Oregon to Sitka, is a coarse herb from 3 to 7 feet high, with numerous conspicuously ribbed and plaited ample leaves, which are ovate, pointed, and clasping. The whole plant is a nearly uniform deep green, including the conspicuous flowers, which form a pyramidal inflorescence sometimes over a foot long. Its thick, fleshy rootstock is sharp and bitter in taste, was used as an emetic by the Indians, and is also now in local use as a cardiac, and in fevers as a sedative. Many other species have conspicuous and peculiar flowers: they are green in V. parvifolium of North Carolina, greenish-purple in V. Woodii (the Indiana pokeweed), green and white in V. Californicum, dark-brown with the outside hoary in V. intermedium of Florida; in V. fimbriatum, of the Mendocino plains, they are fringed and spotted.

veray. A Middle English form of very.

verb (vərb), n. [F. verbe = Sp. Pg. It. verbo, < L. verbum, a word, language, a verb, = E. word, q. v.] 1. A word; a vocable.

That so it might appear, that the assistance of the Spirit, promised to the church, was not a vain thing, or a mere verb.
South, Sermons, IX. v.

2. In gram., a word that asserts or declares; that part of speech of which the office is predication, and which, either alone or with various modifiers or adjuncts, combines with a subject to make a sentence. Predication is the essential function of a verb, and this function is all that makes a verb: that distinctions of tense and mode and person should be involved in a verb-form, as is the case in the languages of our family and in some other languages, is unessential, and those distinctions may be and are sometimes wanting. Infinitives and participles are not verbs, but only verbal nouns and adjectives, sharing in the constructions that belong to a verb. In languages like ours, the most important classification of verbs is into transitive and intransitive; and even that is not definite, nor founded on any essential distinction. Abbreviated v.—Auxiliary, contract, deponent verb. See the adjectives.—Irregular verb, a verb not regular: in English including not only cases like sing, sang, sung (usually called strong verbs), but such as lead, led; put, put; work, wrought.—Liquid, personal, reflexive verb. See the adjectives.—Regular verb, a verb inflected after the most usual model: in English, by addition of -ed or -d in preterit and past participle: as,

seat, seated; pile, piled.—Strong, weak verb. See the adjectives.

verbal (vē'r-bal), a. and u. [F. verbal = Sp. Pg. verbal = It. verbale, < LL. verbales, consisting of words, < L. verbum, a word, verb; see verb.] 1. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or consisting in words.

Cicero the orator complained of Socrates and his school that he was the first that separated philosophy and rhetoric; whereupon rhetoric became an empty and verbal art.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

It is obvious enough that, unless the lower animals have some substitute for verbal symbols, as yet undiscovered by us, they are incapable of general ideas and of any mental processes involving these.

J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 16.

The future progress of our speech, it may be hoped, will bring back to us many a verbal Rip Van Winkle.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xii.

2. Relating to or concerned with words only.

If slight and verbal differences in copies be a good argument against the genuineness of a writing, we have no genuine writing of any ancient author at this day.

Alty, Sharp, Works, II. iii.

Of those scholars who have disdained to confine themselves to verbal criticism few have been successful.

Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

A verbal dispute. Whately.

3. Expressed in spoken words; spoken; not written; oral: as, a verbal contract; verbal testimony.

Made she no verbal question? Shak., Lear, iv. 3. 26.

4. Minutely exact in words; attending to words only; insistent about words.

I am much sorry, Sir,

You put me to forget a lady's manners,
By being so verbal. Shak., Cymbeline, II. 3. 111.

He's grown too verbal; this learning's a great witch.
Middleton, Chaste Maid, I. 1.

Neglect the rules each verbal critic lays.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 261.

5. Literal; having word answering to word; word for word: as, a verbal translation.

All the neighbour caves, as seeming troubled,
Make verbal repetition of her moans.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 831.

6. Of or pertaining to a verb; derived from a verb and sharing in its senses and constructions: as, a verbal noun.

A person is the special difference of a verbal number.
B. Jonson, English Grammar, i. 16.

In its attributive use, finally, the participle throws off its verbal power and approximates an adjective, as in Verantē silva caremus.
Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 317.

Verbal amnesia, the loss of all knowledge of the relation between words and things; complete aphasia.—Verbal contract. See contract.—Verbal definition, a definition intended to state the precise meaning of a word or phrase according to usage, but not to state the essential characters of a form according to the nature of things.—Verbal degradation. See degradation, 1 (a).—Verbal inspiration. See inspiration, 3.—Verbal note, in diplomacy, an unsigned memorandum or note when an affair has continued for a long time without any reply. It is designed to show that the matter is not urgent, but that at the same time it has not been overlooked. Encyc. Dict.—Verbal noun. See II.—Syn. 1-6. Verbal, Oral, Literal. Verbal is much used for oral: as, a verbal message; and sometimes for literal: as, a verbal translation. It is an old and proper rule of rhetoric (Campbell, bk. 2, ch. ii., § 1, canon 1) that, when of two words or phrases one is susceptible of two significations and the other of only one, the latter, for the sake of avoiding obscurity, should be preferred; by this rule we should say an oral message, oral tradition, a literal translation. Verbal nicety or criticism is nicety or criticism about words.

II. n. In gram., a noun derived from a verb and sharing in its senses and constructions; a verbal noun.

verbalism (vē'r-bal-izm), n. [Verbal + -ism.] Something expressed orally; a verbal remark or expression.

verbalist (vē'r-bal-ist), n. [Verbal + -ist.] One who deals in words merely; one skilled in words; a literal adherent to or a minute critic of words; a literalist; a verbalian.

verbality (vē'r-bal'i-ti), n. [Verbal + -ity.] The state or quality of being verbal; bare literal expression. Sir T. Browne.

verbalization (vē'r-bal-i-zā'shon), n. [Verbalize + -ation.] The act of verbalizing, or the state of being verbalized. Also spelled verbalisation.

The verbalization, if I may so express it, of a noun is now a difficult matter, and we shrink from the employment even of well-authorized old nominal verbs.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xiv.

verbalize (vē'r-bal-iz), v.; pret. and pp. verbalized, ppr. verbalizing. [= F. verbaliser; as verbal + -ize.] 1. trans. To convert into a verb. G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., viii.

II. intrans. To use many words; be verbose or diffuse.

Also spelled verbalise.

verbally (vē'r-bal-i), adv. In a verbal manner. (a) In words spoken; by words uttered; orally.

Flowering Plant of American White Hellebore, or Indian Poke (Veratrum viride).
a, male flower; b, perfect flower; c, capsule.

Verbena (vēr-bē-nā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), altered from Verberna on account of a resemblance in the leaves of the original species.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Helianthoidae, type of the subtribe Verbesinae. It is characterized by small or middle-sized corymbose flower-heads (sometimes large, solitary and long-peduncled) with the rays fertile or rarely lacking, and by achenes laterally compressed, distinctly two-winged, sometimes ciliate, and usually awed by a pappus of two rigid or slender bristles. There are about 55 species, natives of warm parts of America, occurring from the Argentine Republic to Mexico, and with 9 species in the southern United States, one yellow-flowered species, V. occidentalis, and perhaps also the white-flowered V. virginica, extending north into Pennsylvania. A few species are naturalized in the Old World. They are herbs or sometimes shrubby, a few becoming small trees of about 20 feet in height, and are known as crown-beard. Their leaves are usually toothed and opposite, and the petioles decurrent. The flower-heads are usually yellow; after blossoming, they are apt to become ovoid or globose by the elevation of a conical receptacle. V. encelioides of Texas, Arizona, and Mexico, now widely dispersed through warm regions, is cultivated for its yellow flowers, sometimes under the name of Ximenesia.

It is characterized by small or middle-sized corymbose flower-heads (sometimes large, solitary and long-peduncled) with the rays fertile or rarely lacking, and by achenes laterally compressed, distinctly two-winged, sometimes ciliate, and usually awed by a pappus of two rigid or slender bristles. There are about 55 species, natives of warm parts of America, occurring from the Argentine Republic to Mexico, and with 9 species in the southern United States, one yellow-flowered species, V. occidentalis, and perhaps also the white-flowered V. virginica, extending north into Pennsylvania. A few species are naturalized in the Old World. They are herbs or sometimes shrubby, a few becoming small trees of about 20 feet in height, and are known as crown-beard. Their leaves are usually toothed and opposite, and the petioles decurrent. The flower-heads are usually yellow; after blossoming, they are apt to become ovoid or globose by the elevation of a conical receptacle. V. encelioides of Texas, Arizona, and Mexico, now widely dispersed through warm regions, is cultivated for its yellow flowers, sometimes under the name of Ximenesia.

and spreading perennial with a few leaves at the base and a few on the stems. It occurs in open places from Florida to Illinois. A few species are cultivated. The numerous cultivated verbenas, very popular in the United States from their brilliant and continuous bloom and from their growth in masses, are largely derived from the South American species V. chamadrifolia, V. phlogifolia, V. teucrioides, and V. crenulata, in nature respectively scarlet, rose-colored, white, and lilac-purple. In cultivation they include all colors except yellow and pure blue; many are striped, and the best have a distinct eye, or bright central spot. Several species are also very fragrant, especially V. teucrioides. V. venosa is more often cultivated in England. 2. [L. e.] A plant of this genus. Lemon-scented verberna. Same as lemon-scented.

Verbenaceae (vēr-bē-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jussieu, 1806), < Verberna + -aceae.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the series Bicarpellatae and cohort Lamiales. It is characterized by an inferior radicle, usually opposite leaves, and irregular bisexual flowers, and is particularly distinguished from the nearly related order Labiatae by an entire ovary and a fruit with either two or four nutlets. It includes about 740 species, belonging to 5 genera, of which the types are Phoradendron, Stille, Clonanthus, Verberna, Vitex, Caraphra, Samolus, and Artemisia. They are either herbs, shrubs, or trees. Their leaves are usually opposite or whorled, entire, toothed, or incised, and without stipules. The inflorescence is a spike, raceme, panicle, or cyme, either simple or compound. The corolla is usually small, commonly with a distinct tube which is often incurved, five or frequently four imbricate flat spreading lobes, and four didynamous stamens; some genera produce only two stamens or a two-lipped corolla with one or more lobes enlarged or erect. The ovary contains at first one, soon two, and at length commonly four cells, each cell usually with one ovule; in fruit it becomes more or less drupeaceous, with a juicy, fleshy, or dry exocarp, and an indurated endocarp, which is indehiscent, or breaks into two or four nutlets, or rarely more. They are rare in the north temperate zone, common in the tropics and in temperate parts of South America. They are herbaceous in colder regions, becoming shrubby in the tropics, or even very large trees, as the teak. The fruit is sometimes edible, as in species of Lantana and Prenanthes, but is more often acid. Their properties are sometimes aromatic. Many are of medicinal repute, as species of Callicarpa, Cassia, and Clerodendron (Compare Stachytarpheta and Vitex). Many genera are cultivated for ornament, as Verberna, Lantana, and Clerodendron, or for the colored fruit, as Callicarpa. Only 4 genera are native within the United States—Lippia, Callicarpa, Phoradendron, and Verberna.

verbenaceous (vēr-bē-nā'shius), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Verbenaceae.

2. The green trees and underwood of a forest: same as vert.

verdancy (vèr'dan-si), n. [ < verdant (+ -cy).]

1. The state or quality of being verdant; greenness. Hence — 2. Rawness; inexperience; liability to be deceived: as, the verdancy of youth.

verdant (vèr'dant), a. [ < OF. verdant (?), F. verdoyant, becoming green, < L. viridant (-s), ppr. of viridare, grow green, make green, < viridis, green, < virere, be green: see verd.] 1. Green; fresh; covered with growing plants or grass: as, verdant fields; a verdant lawn.

The verdant gras my couch did goodly dight.

Spenser, F. Q., I. ix. 13.

2. Green in knowledge; simple by reason of inexperience; inexperienced; unsophisticated; raw; green.

verd-antique (vèrd-an-tèk'), n. [ < OF. verd antique, F. vert antique, 'ancient green,' = It. verde antico: see vert and antique.] An ornamental stone which has long been used and highly prized, having been well known to the ancient Romans. It consists of serpentine, forming a kind of breccia, mingled or interveined with a much lighter material, usually calcite, but sometimes magnesite or steatite, and sometimes a lighter-colored serpentine, the whole forming, when polished, an extremely beautiful material for constructive purposes or for interior decoration. Serpentine of various kinds and of different shades of color were obtained from Italian quarries, and also from those of Greece and Egypt, and were called by various names, according to the region from which they came: thus, verde di Prato, verde di Genova, verde di Pegli, etc. The verde di Prato, quarried near Florence, has been extensively used in various important buildings in that city, as in the cathedral and the campanile of Giotto, as well as in the church of Sta. Maria Novella. Serpentine of the verd-antique type has also been quarried and used in various other regions, as in Cornwall; in the counties of Galway, Donegal, and Sligo in Ireland; in Banffshire, Scotland; and in Vermont and Connecticut in the United States. The objections to its use in outdoor construction are that, as a general rule, it does not stand the weather well, and that it is not easily obtained in large blocks sufficiently free from flaws to justify their use. Also called ophicalcite.

The hills of Antioch are part of them of a crumbling stone, like verd antique.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 193.

verdantly (vèr'dant-li), adv. In a verdant manner. (a) Freshly; flourishingly. (b) After the manner of a person green or simple through inexperience. [Colloq.]

verdantness (vèr'dant-nes), n. The character or state of being verdant, in any sense.

verdea (ver-dä'ä), n. [ < It. verdea (F. verdée), name of a variety of grape and of wine made from it, < verde, green: see verd, vert.] 1. A white grape from which wine is made in Italy. — 2. A wine made from this grape, or in part from it, produced in the neighborhood of Arcetri, near Florence.

verde antico. Same as verd-antique.

verde di Corsica. See gabbro.

verdée (ver-dä'), a. In her, same as verdoy.

verdèr (vèr'dèr), n. Same as verdure, 3.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 480.

verdict (vèr'dikt), n. [Formerly also verdit; < ME. verdit, verдите, verdoit, voirdit, < OF. verdit, verdict, < ML. verdictum, a verdict, lit. 'a true saying or report'; orig. two words, vere dictum: vere, truly; dictum, neut. of dictus, pp. of dicere, say: see diction.] 1. In law, the answer of a jury given to the court concerning any matter of fact in any cause, civil or criminal, committed to their trial and examination. In criminal causes the usual verdict is "guilty" or "not guilty"; in Scotland it may be "not proven." In civil causes it is a verdict for the plaintiff or for the defendant, according to the fact. These are called general verdicts. In some civil causes, when there is a doubt as to how the law ought to be applied to the facts, a special verdict is given finding and stating specific facts, and leaving the court to draw the proper conclusion. See jury.

He tolde me that he seide to the jurores whiche have sealed her verditte: "Seris, I wot well this verditte after my making is not effectuel in lawe, and therefore may happe it shall be makid newe at London." Paston Letters, I. 54.

My soul, . . . thy doubt-depending cause

Quarles, Emblems, iv. Epig. 1.

2. Decision; judgment; opinion pronounced: as, the verdict of the public.

Bad him seye his verdit as him leste.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 787.

Nor caring how slightly they put off the verdit of holy Text unsalv'd.

Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

We will review the deeds of our fathers, and pass that just verdict on them we expect from posterity on our own.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

Open verdict, a verdict upon an inquest which finds that a crime has been committed, but does not specify the criminal, or which finds that a sudden or violent death has occurred, but does not find the cause proved. — Partial verdict. See partial. — Privy verdict. See privy.

— Sealed verdict, a verdict reduced to writing and sealed up for delivery to the court: a method sometimes allowed, to avoid detaining the jury, after they have reached an agreement, until the next session of the court.

— Special verdict, a verdict in which the jury find the facts and state them as proved, but leave the conclusion to be drawn from the facts to be determined by the court according as the law applicable thereto may require. = Syn. 1. Verdict, Judgment, etc. See decision.

verdigris (vèr'di-grès), n. [Formerly also verdigrise (prob. often associated with E. grease, as also with amberggris); < ME. verdegresse, verdegrece, verdegrees, verdgrese, verte grece, verte grez, < OF. verd de gris, 'verdigrise, a Spanish green' (Cotgrave), also vert de gris, F. vert-de-gris (the ME. form verte grece glossed by ML. viride Grecum, lit. 'Greek green'): OF. verd, vert (< ML. viride), green; de, of; Gris, Greeks, pl. of Gri, < L. Græcus, Greek: see Greek and Gru.] For the name 'Greek green,' cf. MHG. grüenspan, spangrün, G. grüenspan, Sw. spångsgroma, spångsgrün, Dan. spångsgrün, D. spangsch-gröen, verdigris, < ML. viride Hispanum (also viride Hispanicum), 'Spanish green.' The F. vert de gris has been erroneously explained as 'green of gray' (gris, gray: see grise<sup>4</sup>); the form verte grez as possibly for vert aigre, green produced by acid (vinegar: see eager<sup>1</sup> and vinegar); also as 'green grit' (grez, grit: see grit<sup>2</sup>); or as substituted for another term for verdigris, namely OF. verderis, < ML. viride æris, verdigris, lit. 'green of copper' (æris, gen. of æs, copper or bronze). Cf. OF. verdet, verdigris, dim. of verd, green.] A substance obtained by exposing plates of copper to the air in contact with acetic acid, and much used as a pigment, as a mordant in dyeing wool black, in calico-printing, and in gilding, in several processes in the chemical arts, and in medicine. Verdigris, like all the compounds into which copper enters, is poisonous; and it is very apt to form on the surface of copper utensils, owing to the action of vegetable juices. It is, chemically, a crystalline salt known as the basic acetate of copper. It ranges in hue from green to greenish-blue, according to the proportions of acetic acid and copper contained. As a pigment it is fairly permanent, but has little body, and is generally used only as a glazing color.

Bole armoniak, verdegrees, boras.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 237.

Distilled verdigris, a neutral acetate of copper, obtained by dissolving common verdigris in hot acetic acid, and allowing the salt to crystallize out of the cooled solution. It forms dark-green crystals.

Court of Love, l. 142.

vermeilologist (vēr-mē-ol'ō-jist), n. [vermeilology + -ist.] One who is versed in vermeilology; a helminthologist.

vermeology (vēr-mē-ol'ō-jī), n. [Irreg. < L. vermis, a worm (> NL. Vermes, the worms), + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge or description of worms; that branch of zoölogy which treats of the Vermes; helminthology.

Vermes (vēr'mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. vermis, a worm, = E. worm.] 1. Worms: formerly including animals resembling the common earth-worm, but having no exact classificatory sense, and hence no standing in zoölogy.—2†. The sixth and last division of animals in the Linnean "Systema Naturæ" (1766), defined as consisting of those animals which have tentacles, cold white blood, and an inarticulate unilocular heart, and comprising all animals which Linnaeus did not dispose under the five other classes Mammalia, Aves, Amphibia, Pisces, and Insecta (or vertebrates and insects). This class Vermes was divided into five orders, Intestina, Mollusca, Testacea, Lithophyta, and Zoophyta, comprising all invertebrates except insects, and was thus the waste-basket of Linnaeus (as Radiata was of Cuvier).

3. One of the eight primary divisions of the animal kingdom; a subkingdom or phylum, one of the leading types of animal life, comprising all those animals which have a body-cavity (Metazoa), no backbone (Invertebrata), normally an intestinal canal (which Celentera have not), not a radiate structure (which Echinodermata have), legs if any not jointed (they are always jointed in Arthropoda), and body vermiform if there are no legs. In this acceptance Vermes form a most comprehensive group, of great diversity of form, but agreeing in certain fundamental structural characters, being generally soft vermiform animals, oftenest segmented and bilaterally symmetrical, without limbs or with unjointed limbs. Vermes thus defined are approximately equivalent—(a) in Lamarck's system (1801–1812), to a class of animals divided into the four orders Molles, Rigiduli, Hispiduli, and Epizoarise (the last including lernæan crustaceans); (b) in the Cuvierian classification (1817), to the whole of Cuvier's first class of Articulata (the annelids of Lamarck, or red-blooded worms with unjointed legs) plus his second and third classes of Radiata (Apoda and Entozoa), plus some of his fourth class of Radiata (some Polypii), plus his first order (Rotifera) of his fifth class of Radiata; (c) in Huxley's classification (1869), to the classes Polyzoa, Scolecida, Annelida, Chaetognatha, and therefore to his two subkingdoms, Annuloida and Annulosa, without the Echinodermata of the former, and without the Crustacea, Arachnida, Myriapoda, and Insecta of the latter; or, in other terms, to his Annuloida minus Echinodermata and plus the whole of the anarthropodous Annulosa. Vermes as here defined have been divided into seven classes: (1) Platyelmintha, with three orders, respectively the turbellarian, trematoid, and cestoid worms; (2) Nematelemintha, with two orders, the nematoid and acanthocephalus worms—most of these two classes, excepting the Turbellaria, being entozoic or ectozoic parasites, as tapeworms, threadworms, etc.; (3) Chaetognatha, based on the single exceptional form Sagitta; (4) Gephyrea (being Cuvier's second order of Echinodermata); (5) Annelida, or ordinary segmented worms, with four orders—Hirudinea (leeches), Oligochaeta (earthworms, etc.), Polychaeta (lobworms, sea-mice, etc.), and Cephalobranchia (tubicolous worms, etc.); (6) Rotifera, the wheel-animalcules; (7) Polyzoa (by most naturalists now dissociated from Vermes). The tendency at present is to break up the unmanageable group and discard the name.

The total abandoning of the indefinite and indefensible group of Vermes.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 812.

4. [i. e.] Plural of vermis.

Vermetacea (vēr-mē-tā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Vermes + -acea.] Same as Vermetidae.

Vermetidae (vēr-met'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vermes + -ida.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, whose typical genus is Vermetus; the worm-shells. The animal has a reduced foot, a single elongated gill, short tentacles, and the eyes at the external sides of the tentacles. The operculum is corneous and circular. The young shells are regularly conic and spiral, like those of Turritella; but as they grow the whorls separate, and often become crooked or contorted.

vermigrade (vér'mi-gräd), a. [< NL. vermi- gradus, < L. vermes, a worm, + gradi, step.] Moving like a worm; wriggling along: noting the Vermigrada.

vermilt, n. An obsolete form of vermeil.

Vermileo (vèr-mil'ē-ō), n. [NL. (Macquart, 1834), < It. vermiglio = F. vermeil: see vermeil.] A genus of snipe-flies, of the family Leptidae: synonymous with Leptus.

vermilingual (vèr-mi-ling'gwəl), a. Same as vermilingual.

Vermilingues (vēr-mi-ling'gwēz), n. pl. Same as Vermilingua, 2.

Vermilinguia (vèr-mi-lìng'gwi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. vermis, a worm, + lingua, tongue.] 1. In Illiger's classification (1811), a family of edentates composed of the ant-eaters, aardvarks, and pangolins, as distinguished from the armadillos (Cingulata), both these being families of his ninth order, Epfodientia: now restricted to the American ant-eaters, as a subordinal group. See cuts under ant-bear and tamandua.—2. In herpet., a superfamily of lizards, including only the chameleons; the Dendrosaurina or Rhaptoglossa. Also Vermilinguinae. See cut under chameleon.

vermilingual (vēr-mī-ling'gwī-əl), a. [As Vermilingua + -al.] 1. Having a vermiform tongue, as an ant-eater or a chameleon; belonging to the Vermilingua. See cut under tamandua.—2. In ornith., same as sagittilingual. See cut under sagittilingual.

vermilion (vêr-mil'yon), n. and a. [Formerly also carminillon, carminion; OF. carmillon, a bright red, also the kermes-insect, also a little word, F. carmillon, vermilion (= Sp. bermellon = Pg. vermelhão = It. carminigione, vermilion). < vermel, bright-red; see vermil.] I. n. 1†. The kermes- or cochineal-insect; also, the product of cochineal; worm-dye.—2. The red sulphid of mercury, or the mineral cinnabar, occurring in nature of a red-brown to a carmine-red color; also, a pigment formerly made by grinding selected pieces of native cinnabar, but now made artificially. The pigment is produced in two ways. (a) In the wet way mercury, sulphur, potash, and water are mixed together in proper proportions, put into horizontal iron cylinders containing agitators, and stirred constantly for about an hour. The mass first turns black, then brick-red, and finally acquires the desired vermilion-red color. The potash is simply a carrier, and does not enter into the composition of the finished product. (b) In the dry way mercury and sulphur are mixed and heated in a kind of retort, the vermilion red subliming over. By slight variations in the process the color may be made pale or deep in shade, and may even be made at will to incline toward scarlet, crimson, or orange. As a pigment it is permanent, becoming dark rather than light on exposure. It possesses great body, and is a very brilliant and vivid red, tinging toward orange. It is used extensively in painting and decorating, for making red sealings, wax, and for other purposes. The name artificial vermilion is also applied to a vermilion red made by precipitating the coal-tar color osm on orange mineral. It is quite equal in color, brilliancy, and body to that made from quicksilver; but it is not very permanent under the direct action of the sun, unless protected by a coat of varnish.

3. A color such as that of the above pigment; a beautiful brilliant red color.

The armies, that equest so bright did show,
Into a pure vermilion now are dyed.

Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 9.

4. A cotton cloth dyed with vermilion.

They buy Cotton Wool in London, that comes first from Cyprus and Smyrna, and at home worke the same, and perfit into Fustians, Vermillions, Dynities, and other such Stuffs, and then returne it to London.

L. Roberts, Treasure of Trafalke, quoted in A. Barlow's (Weaving, p. 26).

verricule (ver'i kŭl), n. [L. verriculum, a drag-net, < verrere, sweep.] In entom., a thick-set tuft of upright parallel hairs.

Vernier scale 0.01 mm.

verruca (ve-rō'kū), n.; pl. verruca (-sē). [NL., < L. verruca, a wart, a steep place, a height.] 1. In pathol., a wart.—2. In bot., a wart or sessile gland produced upon various parts of plants, especially upon a thallus.—3. In zool., a small, flattish, wart-like prominence; a verruciform tubercle.—4. [cap.] A genus of cirripeds, typical of the family Verrucidae.

verrucano (ver-ō-kā'no), n. [It. verrucano, a hard stone used in crushing-mills, < verruca, < L. verruca, a wart.] The name given by Alpine geologists to a conglomerate of more or less imperfectly rounded fragments of white or pale-red quartz, varying in size from that of a grain of sand up to that of an egg, held together by a cement of reddish, greenish, or violet-colored siliceous or talcose material. It occurs in numerous localities both north and south of the Alps, and in northern Italy, sometimes in masses of great thickness, which often take on a gneissoid or schistose structure. In certain localities the verrucano overlies a slaty rock which contains plants of Carboniferous age; hence some geologists have considered it as belonging to that formation, while others have regarded it as the equivalent of the Rothliegendes, the lower division of the Permian.

Verrucaria (ver-ō-kā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Persoon), < L. verrucaria, a plant that drives away warts, < verruca, a wart.] A genus of angiocarpous lichens, typical of the tribe Verrucariacei.

Verrucariacei (ver-ō-kā'ri-ā'sē-i), n. pl. [NL., < Verrucaria + -acei.] A tribe of angiocarpous lichens, having globular apothecia which open only by a pore at the summit, and a proper exciple covering a similarly shaped hymenium, which is in turn included in a more or less distinguishable envelop. Also Verrucariaci.

verrucariaceous (ver-ō-kā'ri-ā'shius), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the genus Verrucaria or the tribe Verrucariacei.

verrucarine (ver-ō-kā'ri-in), a. [It. verrucaria + -ine.] In bot., resembling the genus Verrucaria or the tribe Verrucariacei, or having their characters.

verrucarioid (ver-ō-kā'ri-oid), a. [It. verrucaria + -oid.] In bot., same as verrucarine.

Verrucidae (ve-rō'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Verruca, < L. verruca, a wart.] A family of sessile thoracic Cirripedia, characterized by the absence of a peduncle and the lack of symmetry of the shell, the scuta and terga being deprived of depressor muscles, movable on one side only, on the other united with the rostrum and carina. Verruca is the only genus, with few recent species, but others are found fossil down to the Chalk formation.

verruciform (ve-rō'si-fōrm), a. [It. verruca, a wart, + forma, form.] Warty; resembling a wart in appearance. Also verruciform.

verrucose (ver'ō-kōs), a. [It. verrucosus; see verrucous.] Same as verrucous.

verrucous (ver'ō-kus), a. [= F. verruqueux, < L. verrucosus, full of warts, < verruca, a wart; see verruca.] Warty; studded with verruciform elevations or tubercles.

verruculose (ve-rō'kü-lōs), a. [It. verrucula, a little eminence, a little wart (dim. of verruca, a wart), + -ose.] Minutely verrucose; covered with small warts or wart-like elevations.

verrugas (ve-rō'gās), n. [It. verrugas, pl. of verruca, < L. verruca, a wart.] A specific disease, often fatal, occurring in Peru; frambesia. A prominent characteristic is the appearance of warty growths on the skin. See also yaws.

versability (vēr-sā-bil'i-ti), n. [It. versabile + -ity.] The state or quality of being versable; aptness to be turned round.

Now the use of the Auxiliaries is at once to set the soul a-going by herself upon the materials, as they are brought her, and by the versability of this great engine, round which they are twisted, to open new tracts of inquiry, and make every idea engender millions.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, v. 42.

versable (vēr'sā-bl), a. [It. versabilis, movable, changeable, < versare, turn or whirl about; see versant.] Capable of being turned. Blount, 1670.

versableness (vēr'sā-bl-nes), n. The character or state of being versable; versability.

versal (vēr'sal), a. [Abbr. of universal. Cf. varsal.] Universal; whole.

She looks as pale as any clout in the versal world.

Shak., R. and J., ii. 4. 219.

Some, for brevity,

Have cast the versal world's nativity.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 930.

versant (vēr'sant), a. and n. [It. versant, < L. versant (-s), ppr. of versare, turn or whirl about; see verse<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. a. Familiar; conversant; versed.

1. With great pains and difficulty, got the whole book of the Canticles translated into each of these languages, by priests esteemed the most versant in the language of each nation.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 404.

The Bishop of London is . . . thoroughly versant in ecclesiastical law.

Sydney Smith, First Letter to Archdeacon Singleton.

(Duacis).

2. In her., carrying the wings erect and open. It is generally held to be the same as elevated and pur-suant, but seems to refer especially to a display of the under surface of the wings.

II. n. All that part of a country which slopes or inclines in one direction; the general lie or slope of surface; aspect.

versatile (vēr'sā-til), a. [It. versatile = Sp. versátil = Pg. versatil = It. versatile, < L. versatilis, revolving, movable, versatile, < versare, turn; see verse<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. Capable of being moved or turned round: as, a versatile spindle.

At y<sup>e</sup> Royal Society's Mr Wm Petty propos'd divers things for the improvement of shipping: a versatile keele that should be on hinges.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 20, 1661.

He had a versatile timber house built in Mr Hart's garden (opposite to St. James's park) to try the experiment. He would turne it to the sun, and sit towards it.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xx.

The versatile mind, ever ready to turn its attention in a new and unexplored quarter.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 97.

4. In bot., swinging or turning freely on a support; especially noting an anther fixed by the middle on the apex of the filament, and swinging freely to and fro. See cuts under anther and lily.—5. In ornith., specifically, reversible: noting any toe of a bird which may be turned either forward or backward.

It is advantageous to a bird of prey to be able to spread the toes as widely as possible, that the talons may seize the prey like a set of grapping irons; and accordingly the toes are widely divergent from each other, the outer one in the owls and a few hawks being quite versatile.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 130.

6. In entom., moving freely up and down or laterally: as, versatile antennæ.—Versatile dementia, a form of dementia in which the patient is talkative and restless, often with a tendency to destroy, without reason, any objects within his reach.—Versatile head, in entom., a head that can be freely moved in every direction.

versatily (vēr'sā-til-li), adv. In a versatile manner.

versatileness (vēr'sā-til-nes), n. The state or quality of being versatile; versatily.

versatility (vēr'sā-til'i-ti), n. [It. versatilità = Sp. versatilidad = Pg. versatilidade = It. versatilità; as versatile + -ity.] 1. The state or character of being changeable or fickle; variability.

The evils of inconstancy and versatility, ten thousand times worse than those of obstinacy and the blindest prejudice.

Burke, Rev. in France.

2. The faculty of easily turning one's mind to new tasks or subjects; facility in taking up various pursuits or lines of thought or action; versatileness: as, the versatility of genius.

I do not mean the force alone,

The grace and versatility of the man.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

3. Specifically, in ornith., capability of turning either backward or forward, as a toe; the versatile movement of such a digit.

versation (vēr-sā'shon), n. A turning or winding. Blount, 1670.

Verschoorist (vēr'skōr-ist), n. [It. Verschoor (see def.) + -ist.] One of a minor sect in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century, followers of one Verschoor. They are also called Hebraists, because of their application to the study of Hebrew.

vers de société (vers dé sō-sē-ā-tā'). [F.] Same as society verse (which see, under society).

verse<sup>1</sup> (vêrs), v. t. [It. versare, F. verser = Sp. Pg. versar = It. versare, < L. versare, OL. vorsare, turn, wind, twist, or whirl about, turn over in the mind, meditate; in middle voice, versari, move about, dwell, live, be occupied or engaged or concerned; freq. of vertere, vortere, pp. versus, vorsus, turn, turn about, overturn, change, alter, transform, translate; in middle voice, be occupied or engaged, be in a place or condition, = AS. weorðan, E. worth, be: see worth<sup>1</sup>.] To turn; revolve, as in meditation.

Who, versing in his mind this thought, can keep his cheeks dry?

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 344.

verse<sup>2</sup> (vêrs), n. [It. vers, partly, and in the early form fers wholly, < AS. fers, partly < OF. (and F.) vers = Sp. Pg. It. verso = D. G. Sw. Dan. vers, < L. versus (pl. versus), also vorsus, a furrow, a line, row, in particular a line of writing, and in poetry a verse, lit. a turning, turn (hence a turn at the end of a furrow, etc.), < vertere, pp. versus, turn: see verse<sup>1</sup>. Hence verse<sup>2</sup>, v., versicle, versify, etc.] 1. In pros.: (a) A succession of feet (colon or period) written or printed in one line; a line: as, a poem of three hundred verses; hence, a type of metrical composition, as represented by a metrical line; a meter. A verse may be catalectic, dimeter, trimeter, iambic, dactylic, rimed, unrimed, alliterative, etc.

He made of ryme ten vers or twelve.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 463.

They . . . thought themselves no small fooles, when they could make their verses goe all in ryme as did the schooles of Salerne. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 9.

It does not follow that, because a man is hanged for his faith, he is able to write good verses.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 295.

(b) A type of metrical composition, represented by a group of lines; a kind of stanza: as, Spenserian verse; hence, a stanza: as, the first verse of a (rimed) hymn.

Now, good Cesario, but that piece of song . . .
Come, but one verse.

Shak., T. N., ii. 4. 7.

A young lady proceeded to entertain the company with a ballad in four verses.

Dickens, Oliver Twist, xxvi.

A stanza—often called a verse in the common speech of the present day—may be a group of two, three, or any number of lines.

S. Laniel, Sci. of Eng. Verse, p. 239.

(c) A specimen of metrical composition; a piece of poetry; a poem. [Rare.]

This verse be thine, my friend. Pope, Epistle to Jervas.

(d) Metrical composition in general; versification; hence, poetical composition; poetry, especially as involving metrical form: opposed to prose.

To write, to th' honour of my Maker dread,

Verse that a Virgin without blush may read.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

Who says in verse what others say in prose.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 202.

Poets, like painters, their machinery claim,

And verse bestows the varnish and the frame.

O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

2. (a) A succession of words written in one line; hence, a sentence, or part of a sentence, written, or fitted to be written, as one line; a stich or stichos. It was a custom in ancient times to write prosaic as well as metrical books in lines of average length. (See colometry, stichometry.) This custom was continued especially in writing the poetical books of the Bible, which, though not metrical in form, are composed in balanced clauses, and in liturgical forms taken from or similar to these. Hence—(b) In liturgics, a sentence, or part of a sentence, usually from the Scriptures, especially from the Book of Psalms, said alternately by an officiant or leader and the choir or people; specifically, the sentence, clause, or phrase said by the officiant or leader, as distinguished from the response of the choir or congregation; a versicle. In the hour-offices a verse is especially a sentence following the responsory after a lesson. In the gradual the second sentence is called a verse, and also that following the alleluia. Also versus. (c) In church music, a passage or movement for a single voice or for soloists, as contrasted with chorus; also, a soloist who sings such a passage. (d) A short division of a chapter in any book of Scripture, usually forming one sentence, or part of a long sentence or period. The present division of verses in the Old Testament is inherited, with modifications, from the masoretic division of verses (pesuqim), and has been used in Latin and other versions since 1528. The present division of verses in the New Testament was made by Robert Stephanus on a horseback journey from Paris to Lyons, in an edition published in 1551. In English versions the verses were first marked in the Geneva Bible of 1560. (e) A similar division in any book.—Adonic, Alcaic, Alcmæan verse. See the adjectives. Blank verse, unrimed verse; particularly, that form of unrimed heroic verse which is commonly employed in English dramatic and epic poetry. It was introduced by

Though she have a better verser got

L. Bacon, The Forest, xii
In the Forest, the poet is not a Poet, but a Verser, as we say in the Court-account.

verse-service (vêrs'sêr'vis), n. In Eng. church music, a choral service for solo voices. Compare verse and verse.

verset (vêr'set), n. [< F. verset, dim. of vers, verse: see verset.] 1. A verse, as of Scripture; a versicle.

They bear an equal part with Priest in many places, and have their cues and versets as well as he.

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

2. In music, a short piece of organ-music suitable for use as an interlude or short prelude in a church service.

verse-tale (vêrs'tâl), n. A tale written or told in verse.

Many of the verse-tales are bright and spirited, and even pathos and melancholy are tempered by a certain quiet—sometimes satirical—humour.

The Asiatick, Oct. 12, 1889, p. 232.

versicle (vêr'si-kl), n. [< L. versiculus, a little verse, dim. of versus, a verse: see verset.] A little verse; specifically, in liturgies, one of a succession of short verses said or sung alternately by the officiant and choir or people; especially, the verse said by the officiant or leader as distinguished from the response (R) of the choir or congregation. See verse, 2 (b). The name of the versicles is sometimes given distinctively to the versicles and responses prophets after the creed at morning and evening prayer in the Anglican Church. The liturgical sign of the versicle, used in prayer-books, is V.

Do it for thy name. Do it for thy goodness, for thy covenant, thy law, thy glory, &c., in several versicles.

Purcell, Prayerbook, p. 198.

The Gloria Patri was composed by the Nicene Council, the latter versicle by St. Jerome.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), II, 255.

versicolor, versicolour (vêr'si-kul'ôr), a. [< L. versicolor, versicolour, that changes its color, < versari, change (see verset), + color: see color.] 1. Having several different colors; party-colored; variegated in color.

Chains, girdles, rings, versicolour ribands.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 478.

2. Changeable in color, as the chameleon; glancing different hues or tints in different lights; iridescent; sheeny. Also versicolorate. Also verse-colored, versicolored, versicolorous.

versicolourate (vêr'si-kul'ôr-ât), a. [< versicolor + -ate.] In entom., same as versicolor, 2.

versicolored (vêr'si-kul'ôr-d), a. [< versicolor + -ed.] Same as versicolor: as, versicolored plumage; "a versicolored cloak." Landor.

versicolorous (vêr'si-kul'ôr-us), a. [< versicolor + -ous.] Same as versicolor.

versicular (vêr'sik'û-lâr), a. [< L. versiculus, dim. of versus, verse (see versicle).] Pertaining to verses; designating distinct divisions of a writing; as, a versicular division.

versification (vêr'si-fi-kâ'sh'ôn), n. [< F. versification = Sp. versificación = Pg. versificação = It. versificazione, < L. versificatio(-n-), < versificare, versify: see versify.] The act, art, or practice of composing poetic verse; the construction or measure of verse or poetry; metrical composition.

Donne alone . . . had your talent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your versification.

Dryden, Essay on Satire.

But versification alone will certainly degrade and render disgusting the sublimest sentiments.

Goldsmith, Poetry Distinguished from Other Writing.

The theory that versification is not an indispensable requisite of a poem seems to have become nearly obsolete in our time.

Encyc. Brit., XIX, 259.

versificator (vêr'si-fi-kâ-tôr), n. [< F. versificateur = Sp. versificador = It. versificatore, < L. versificator, < versificare, versify: see versify.] A versifier. [Rare.]

I must farther add that Statius, the best versificator next to Virgil, knew not how to design after him, though he had the model in his eye.

Dryden, Essay on Satire.

Alliteration and epithets, which with mechanical versificators are a mere artifice, . . . charm by their consonance when they rise out of the emotions of the true poet.

L. P. Smith, Amén, of Lit., II, 128.

versificatrix (vêr'si-fi-kâ-triks), n. [< L. as if versificator, fem. of versificator: see versificator.] A woman who makes verses. [Rare.]

In 1784 Beattie, writing of Hannah More, says that Johnson "told me, with great solemnity, that she was 'the most powerful versificatrix' in the English language."

Athenæum, No. 3244, p. 894.

versifier (vêr'si-fi-êr), n. [< versify + -er.] 1. One who versifies; one who makes verses; a poet.

There is a versificator seith that the ydel man excuseth hym in wynter because of the grete cold and in somer by echousure of the heete. Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.

There have been many most excellent Poets that never versified, and now swarms many versifiers that neede neuer answer to the name of Poets.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie (ed. Arber), p. 23.

2. One who expresses in verse the ideas of another; one who turns prose into verse; a maker of a metrical paraphrase: as, a versifier of the Psalms.

versiform (vêr'si-fôr'm), a. [< LL. versiformis, changeable, < L. versus, in lit. sense 'turning,' + forma, form.] Varied or varying in form.

versify (vêr'si-fi), v.; pret. and pp. versified, ppr. versifying. [< F. versifier = Sp. Pg. versificar = It. versificare, < L. versificare, put into verse, versify, < versus, verse, + facere, make, do (see -fy).] 1. trans. 1. To turn into verse; make a metrical paraphrase of: as, to versify the Psalms.

The 30th Psalm was the first which Luther versified; then the 12th, 46th, 14th, 53rd, 67th, 124th, and 128th, which last Huss had done before, and it was only modernised by Luther.

Burney, Hist. Music, III, 35, note.

Our fair one . . . made us versify.

The legend. Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook.

2. To relate or describe in verse: treat as the subject of verse.

I versify the truth.

Daniel, Civil Wars, I.

A lady loses her muff, her fan, or her lap-dog, and so the silly poet runs home to versify the disaster.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xvii.

II. intrans. To make verses.

I received your letter, sent me last week: whereby I perceive you otherwhiles continue your old exercise of versifying in English.

Spenser, To Gabriel Harvey.

In versifying he was attempting an art which he had never learned, and for which he had no aptitude.

Southey, Bunyan, p. 40.

versing (vêr'sing), n. [Verbal n. of verse, 2, v.] The act of writing verse.

version (vêr'sh'ôn), n. [< F. version = Sp. version = Pg. versão = It. versione, < ML. versio(-n-), a turning, translation, < L. vertere, pp. versus, turn, translate: see verset.] 1. A turning round or about; change of direction.

The first was called the strophe, from the version or circular motion of the singers in that stanza from the right hand to the left.

Congreve, On the Pandaric Ode.

What kind of comet, for magnitude, colour, version of the beams, placing in the region of heaven, or lasting, produceth what kind of effects.

Bacon, Vicissitudes of Things (ed. 1887).

2. A change or transformation; conversion.

The version of air into water. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 27.

3. The act of translating, or rendering from one language into another. [Rare.]—4. A translation; that which is rendered from another language. A list of versions of the Bible will be found under the word Bible.

I received the Manuscript you sent me, and, being a little curious to compare it with the Original, I find the Version to be very exact and faithful.

Howell, Letters, I, vi, 27.

Better a dinner of herbs and a pure conscience than the stalled ox and infancy is my version.

Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, iv.

5. A statement, account, or description of incidents or proceedings from some particular point of view: as, the other party's version of the affair.—6. A school exercise consisting of a translation from one language, generally one's own, into another.—7. In obstet., a manipulation whereby a malposition of the child is rectified, during delivery, by bringing the head or the feet into the line of the axis of the parturient canal; turning. According as the feet or the head may be brought down, the operation is called podalic or cephalic version. Pelvic version is that which converts a malpresentation into a breech-presentation. Version is called external when it is effected by external manipulation only, internal when it is performed by the hand within the parturient canal, and bimanual or bipolar when one hand acting directly upon the child in the uterus is aided by the other placed upon the abdominal wall.

8. In mathematical physics, the measure of the direction and magnitude of the rotation about a neighboring point produced by any vector function distributed through space. Thus, if the vector function is the velocity of a fluid at the different points of space, its curl or version is the rotation of that fluid at any point where its motion is rotational. The advantage of the word version over rotation is that it is applicable to cases where there is no motion: as, for example, to a stress. — Italic version of the Bible. See Italic. Revised version (sometimes called the revision of the authorized version, or the new revision, or the revision simply), a revision of the authorized or King James version of the Bible, executed by two companies of scholars, one working on the Old Testament, the other on the New Testament, 1870–84. The work was originated by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, England, in 1870; subsequently the cooperation of American scholars of different Protestant evangelical denominations was invited; and the work was accomplished by the two international committees, on the basis of the King James version, the resolutions of the Convocation specifically providing that "we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible, or any alteration of the language, except where, in the judgment of the most competent scholars, such change is necessary." The work of revising the New Testament was completed in November, 1880, that of the Old Testament in July, 1884. Abbreviated R. V., Rev. Ver. = Spontaneous version, in abstract, the rectification of a malpresentation by the action of the uterine muscles alone, without the interference of the accoucheur. = Syn. 4. See translation.

versional (vēr'shon-əl), a. [version + -al.] Of or pertaining to a version or translation.

All the suggestions for emendations [of the Bible], whether textual or versional.

The Independent (New York), March 23, 1871.

versionist (vēr'shon-ist), n. [version + -ist.] One who makes a version; a translator; also, one who favors a certain version or translation. Gent. Mag.

verso (vēr'sō), n. [L. verso, abl. of versus, turned, pp. of vertere, turn: see vers<sup>1</sup>.] The reverse, back, or other side of some object, specifically—(a) Of a coin or medal, the reverse: opposed to obverse. (b) Of a manuscript or print, the second or any succeeding left-hand page; a page of even number: opposed to recto, or one of uneven number: as, verso of title, the back of the title-page of a book.

versor (vēr'sor), n. [NL., < L. vertere, pp. versus, turn: see vers<sup>1</sup>.] A particular kind of quaternion; an operator which, applied to a vector lying in a plane related in a certain way to the versor, turns the vector through an angle without altering its modulus, tensor, or length. Every quaternion is a product, in one way only, of a tensor and a versor; and that versor is called the versor of the quaternion, and is represented by a capital V written before the symbol of the quaternion.

versorium (vēr-sō'ri-um), n. A magnetic needle delicately mounted so as to move freely in a horizontal plane: so called by Gilbert. Encyc. Brit., XV, 220.

verst (vēr'st), n. [Also sometimes verst (after G.): = F. verst, < Russ. versta, a verst, also a verst-post, equality, age; perhaps orig. 'turn,' hence a distance, a space, for **vertta*, < Russ. verteti (Slav. √ vert), turn, = L. vertere, turn: see vers<sup>1</sup>.] A Russian measure of length, containing 3,500 English feet, or very nearly two thirds of an English mile, and somewhat more than a kilometer.

versual (vēr'sū-əl), a. [L. versus, a verse, + -al.] Of the character of a verse; pertaining to verses or short paragraphs, generally of one sentence or clause: as, the versual divisions of the Bible: correlated with capital, sectional, pausal, parenthetical, punctual, literal, etc. W. Smith's Bible Dict.

versute (vēr-sūt'), a. [L. versutus, adroit, versatile, < vertere, pp. versus, turn: see vers<sup>1</sup>, and cf. versant.] Crafty; wily.

A person . . . of versute and vertiginous policy.

Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 132. (Davies.)

vert<sup>1</sup> (vēr't), n. [F. vert, green, < OF. verd, < L. viride, green, green color: see verd<sup>1</sup>.] 1. In Eng. forest law, everything within a forest bearing a green leaf which may serve as a cover for deer, but especially great and thick coverts; also, a power to cut green trees or wood.

Cum furca, fossa, sock, . . . vert, veth, venison.

Charter, Q. Anne, 1705. (Jamieson.)

The Holy Clerk shall have a grant of vert and venison in my woods of Warnccliffe. Scott, Ivanhoe, xl.

I was interested in the preservation of the venison and the vert more than the hunters or wood-choppers.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 269.

2. In her., the tincture green. It is represented by diagonal lines from the dexter chief to the sinister base. Abbreviated v.—Nether vert, underwoods.—Over vert or overt vert, trees serving for browse, shelter, and defense; the great forest as distinguished from underwoods.—Special vert, in old Eng. forest law, trees and plants capable of serving as covert for deer, and bearing fruit on which they feed: so called because its destruction was a more serious offense than the destruction of other vert.

Vert.

vert<sup>2</sup> (vēr't), n. [Taken for convert and pervert, with the distinguishing prefix omitted.] One who leaves one church for another; a convert or pervert, according as the action is viewed by members of the church joined or members of the church abandoned: said especially of persons who go from the Church of England to the Church of Rome. [Colloq., Eng.]

vert<sup>2</sup> (vēr't), v. i. [< vert<sup>2</sup>, n.] To become a "vert"; leave the Church of England for the Roman communion, or vice versa. [Colloq., Eng.]

vertant (vēr'tant), a. [L. vertere, turn, turn about, + -ant.] In her., bent in a curved form; flexed or bowed.

vertebra (vēr'tē-brā), n.; pl. vertebræ (-brē). [Formerly in E. form vertebra, q. v.: = F. vertebre = Sp. vértebra = It. vertebra, < L. vertebra, a joint, a bone of the spine, < vertere, turn, turn about: see vers<sup>1</sup>.] 1. In Vertebrata, any bone of the spine; any segment of the backbone. See backbone and spine. Specifically—(a) Broadly, any axial metamer of a vertebrate, whether osseous, cartilaginous, or merely fibrous, including the segments of the skull as well as those of the trunk. (b) Narrowly, one of the usually separate and distinct bones or cartilages of which the spinal column consists, in most cases composed of a centrum or body, with or without ankylosed ribs, and with a neural arch and various other processes. The centrum is the most solid and the axial part of the bone, with which a pair of neurapophyses are sutured (see cuts under cervical and neurocentral), these apophyses forming the pedicels and laminae of human anatomy, united in a neural spine or spinous process. Each neurapophysis bears a diapophysis, the transverse process of human anatomy, and a prezygapophysis and a postzygapophysis, called in man the superior and inferior oblique or articular processes, by means of which the successive arches are jointed; together with, in many cases, additional processes connected with these (the anapophyses, metapophyses, and parapophyses), the trace of one of which in the lumbar vertebrae of man is known as the mammillary tubercle. (See cuts under atlas, endostyle, ton, dorsal, laryngopharynx and lumbar.) Certain other formations on the neurapophyses provide in some cases for the additional interlocking of these arches. (See zygapophyseal, zygantrum.) The above-named processes are either autogenous or endogenous, or else exogenous, in different cases and in different animals; they are all that ordinary vertebrae present; and all of them may abort, especially in the caudal region, or be disguised, as by ankylosis, in the sacral region. (See cuts under epileura, sacrum, and sacrum.) The centrum of certain vertebrae of some animals bears a single median inferior process. (See hypapophysis.) Vertebral centra do not always correspond exactly to neural arches, owing to intercalation of additional bodies (perhaps corresponding to ordinary intervertebral disks), so that a given arch, like most ribs, may articulate with two centra. (See intercentrum, embolomerous, rachitomous.) Bodies of free vertebrae articulate with one another by their faces, usually with the intervention of a pulpy fibrocartilage. According to the shapes of these faces, they are described as amphicelium, procelium, opisthocelium (see these words), and heterocelium, and also called biconcave, convexo-convex, convexo-concave, and saddle-shaped. Arches of vertebrae are often connected, as in many fishes, with dermal bones. (See interhemal, interneural.) Ordinary vertebrae are conveniently grouped, according to the region they occupy, as cervical, dorsal or thoracic, lumbar, sacral, and caudal or coccygeal, respectively indicated in vertebral formulae by the letters C, D, L, S, Cd. In man and most mammals this grouping is well marked by the developed or undeveloped condition of the ribs in the three former regions, and by extensive ankyloses in the two latter, as well as by the size, shape, and other characters of the individual bones; but such distinctions fail of application to some vertebrates. Cetaceans and sirenians have no sacrum to separate lumbar from caudal vertebrae; some cetaceans have consolidated cervicals (see cut under ankylosis); birds have extensively ankylosed dorsals and a remarkably complex sacrum (see cuts under sacrum and sacrum); snakes have vertebrae gently graded in character from head to tail; in fishes the vertebrae are ordinarily grouped as abdominal, which extend from the head as far as the cavity of the belly extends, and caudal, all the rest of the bones, including some special elements (see heterocercal, homocercal, epural, hypural). Such regional variations in the characters of vertebrae also give rise to the terms cervicodorsal, dorsolumbar, lumbosacral, urosacral, etc. Certain vertebrae have individual names, as atlas, axis, odontoid; see also phrases given below. The number of vertebrae varies widely; it is greatest in some reptiles (over 200). Seven cervicals is the rule in mammals, with rare exceptions (see stethy); but there is no constancy, as regards number, in any of the other regions of the spinal column. See skeleton and the cuts there cited, also cuts under atlas, axis, chevron-bone, and zenarthal.

2. In echinoderms, any one of the numerous axial ossicles of the arms of starfishes. See vertebral, a., 5.—Cranial vertebra, any one of the segments of the skull which has been theoretically assumed to be homologous with a vertebra proper, as by Goethe, Carus, Oken, Owen, and others. Three or four such vertebrae have been recognized in the composition of the skull, named as follows, from behind forward: (1) the occipital or epencephalic, nearly or quite coincident with the compound occipital bone, of which the basioccipital is the centrum, the exoccipitals are the neurapophyses, and the supra-occipital is the neural spine (see cuts under Cleibania, Esoc, and skull). (2) the parietal, mesencephalic, or otic, represented mainly by the basioccipital as centrum, the alisphenoids as neurapophyses, and the parietals as a pair of expansive neural spines, but also including parts of the skull of the ear (see cuts under Balanista, parietal, sphenoid, and tymppanic). (3) the frontal, prosencephalic, or ophthalmic, represented mainly by the presphenoid as centrum, the orbitosphenoids as neurapophyses, and the frontal or frontals as a single or bifid neural spine (see cuts under craniofacial, Galline, and sphenoid). (4) the nasal, rhinencephalic, or olfactory, based mainly upon the vomer, ethmoid, and nasal bones. Hemal arches of each of these theoretical vertebrae are sought in the facial, hyoidean, and branchial arches. Three of these supposed vertebrae are distinctly recognizable in most skulls as cranial segments; but these segments are exclusive of the capsules of the special senses, and are not regarded as vertebral, since their cartilaginous basis is not metamorphically segmented. See skull, parachordal, and cuts under chondrocranium, orbit, skull, and paraspine.—Dorsocervical vertebrae. See dorsocervical.—Epencephalic vertebra. See cranial vertebra.—False vertebra, an ankylosed vertebra, as of the sacrum and coccyx of man: an antiquated phrase in human anatomy.—Frontal vertebra. See cranial vertebra.—Laminae of a vertebra. See lamina.—Mesencephalic, nasal, occipital, olfactory, ophthalmic, otic, parietal, prosencephalic, rhinencephalic vertebra. See cranial vertebra.—Odontoid vertebra. Same as axis, 3 (a).—Spinous process of a vertebra. See spinous.—Toothed vertebra. Same as axis, 3 (a).—True vertebra, a free vertebra: an antiquated phrase in human anatomy. Vertebra dentata. Same as axis, 3 (a).—Vertebra prominens, the prominent vertebra; that vertebra whose spinous process is most prominent. In man this is the seventh cervical; but the most prominent vertebra is usually one of the dorsals.

vertebral (vēr'tē-brāl), a. and n. [= F. vertébral = Sp. Pg. vertebral = It. vertebrale, < NL. vertebralis, < l. vertebra, a joint, vertebra: see vertebra.] 1. a. Of the nature of a vertebra; characteristic of or peculiar to vertebrae: as, vertebral elements or processes; vertebral segmentation.—2. Pertaining to or relating to a vertebra or to vertebrae; spinal: as, vertebral arteries, nerves, muscles; a vertebral theory or formula.—3. Composed of vertebrae; axial, as the backbone of any vertebrate; spinal; rachidian: as, the vertebral column.—4. Having vertebrae; backboned; vertebrate: as, a vertebral animal. [Rare.]—5. In Echinodermata, axial: noting the median ossicles of the ray of any starfish, a series of which forms a solid internal axis of any ray or arm, each ossicle consisting of two lateral halves united by a longitudinal suture, and articulated by tenon-and-mortise joints upon their terminal surfaces. See Ophiuridae, and cuts under Asteridae and Astrophyton.

Each of these ossicles (which are sometimes termed vertebral) is surrounded by four plates—one median and antambulacral, two lateral, and one median and superambulacral. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 482.

6. In entom., situated on or noting the median line of the upper surface.—Anterior vertebral vein. See vein.—Vertebral aponeurosis, a fascia separating the muscles belonging to the shoulder and arm from those which support the head and spine, stretched from the spinous processes of the vertebrae to the angles of the ribs, beneath the serratus posticus superior, and continuous with the fascia nucha. Also called vertebral fascia.—Vertebral artery, a branch of the subclavian which passes through the vertebral canal to enter the foramen magnum and form with its fellow the basilar artery. It gives off in man posterior meningeal, anterior and posterior spinal, and inferior cerebellar arteries.—Vertebral arthropathy, a form of spinal or tabetic arthropathy accompanied by changes in shape of the vertebrae.—Vertebral border of the scapula, in human anat., that border of the scapula which lies nearest the spinal column. It is morphologically the proximal end of the bone. See scapula and shoulder-blade.—Vertebral canal. See canal.—Vertebral caries, a tuberculous disease of one or more of the bodies of the vertebrae; Pott's disease of the spine: the cause of angular curvature of the spine.—Vertebral chain, vertebral column. Same as spinal column (which see, under spinal).—Vertebral fascia. Same as vertebral aponeurosis.—Vertebral foramen. See foramen and vertebraral.—Vertebral formula, the abbreviated expression of the number of vertebrae in each of the recognized regions of the spinal column. The formula normal to man is C 7, D 12, L 5, S 5, Cd 1-3.—Vertebral muscles, axial (epaxial, paraxial, or hypaxial) muscles which lie along the trunk in relation with vertebrae or vertebral segments. In the lower vertebrates, whose axial musculature is segmented into numerous myocommata (the flakes of the flesh of fish, for example), such muscles are coincident, to some extent, with vertebrae. In the higher, most of the vertebral muscles extend undivided along several vertebrae, though their segmentation may be traced in their deeper layers or fascicles, as in the so-called fourth and fifth layers of the muscles of the back of man. Those hypaxial muscles which lie under (in man, in front of) the vertebrae are grouped as prevertebral, as the scaleni of the neck and psoas of the loins.—Vertebral ossicle. Same as ambulacral ossicle (which see, under ambulacral). See also vertebra, 2, and vert, a., 5.—Vertebral plexus. See plexus.—Vertebral ribs, in man, the two lowest ribs on each side, connected with the vertebrae only; the floating ribs; distinguished from vertebrochondral and from vertebrosternal ribs.—Vertebral vein. See vein.

II. n. 1. A vertebrate. [Rare.]—2. A vertebral artery.

verticality (ver-ti-kal'i-tiv, n. [= F. verticalité; as vertical + -ity.] The state of being vertical; verticalness. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 3.

vertically (vēr'ti-kal-i), adv. In a vertical manner, position, or direction; in a line or plane passing through the zenith; also, upward toward or downward from the zenith.

Butterflies, when they alight, close their wings vertically, moths expand them horizontally.

G. H. Lewis, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., II. 144.

The flakes fell softly and vertically through the motionless air, and all the senses were full of languor and repose.

Hovells, Venetian Life, iii.

verticalness (vēr'ti-kal-nes), n. The state of being vertical; verticality.

verticel (vēr'ti-sel), n. Same as verticil.

vertices, n. Latin plural of vertex.

verticil (vēr'ti-sil), n. [Also verticel; = F. verticille = Sp. Pg. It. verticello, < L. verticillus, the whirl of a spindle, dim. of vertex, a whirl; see vertex.] 1. In bot., a whorl: applied to organs, as leaves or flowers, that are disposed in a circle or ring around an axis. — 2. In zool., a whorl, or circular set of parts radiating from an axis: as, a verticil of hairs, tentacles, or processes.

verticillaster (vēr'ti-sil-as'tēr), n. [NL., < L. verticillus, the whirl of a spindle (see verticil), + dim. -aster.] In bot., a form of inflorescence in which the flowers are arranged in a seeming whorl, consisting in fact of a pair of opposite axillary, usually sessile, cymes or clusters, as in many of the Labiatae.

verticillate (vēr'ti-sil-as'trāt), a. [ < verticillaster + -ate.] In bot., bearing or arranged in verticillasters.

verticillate (vēr'ti-sil'āt), a. [= F. verticillé = Sp. verticulado = Pg. verticillado = It. verticillato, < NL. **verticillatus*, < L. verticillus, a whirl: see verticil.] Whorled; disposed in a verticil, as leaves or flowers; having organs so disposed. — Verticillate antennæ, in entom., antennæ whose joints are whorled with verticils of hairs. — Verticillate leaves, in bot., same as stellate leaves (which see, under stellate).

verticillated (vēr'ti-sil'āt-ed), a. [ < verticillate + -ed.] Same as verticillate.

verticillately (vēr'ti-sil'āt-li), adv. In a verticillate manner.

verticillate-pilose (vēr'ti-sil'āt-pī'lōs), a. Pilose or hairy in whorls, as the antennæ of some insects.

verticillation (vēr'ti-sil'ā-shon), n. [ < verticillate + -ion.] The formation of a verticil; the presence or existence of verticils; a set of verticils, or one of them; annulation.

In the Dicladenaria the spines are hollow, long, and set with rings or verticillations. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 167.

verticillus (vēr'ti-sil'us), n.; pl. verticilli (-i). [NL.: see verticil.] A verticil.

verticity (vēr'ti-si'ti), n. [ < F. verticité = Sp. verticidad = Pg. verticidade: as vertex (vertic-) + -ity.] A tendency to turn; specifically, the directive force of magnetism.

We believe the verticity of the needle, without a certificate from the days of old. Glanville.

Whether then they be globules, or no; or whether they have a verticity about their own centers.

Locke, Human Understanding, IV. ii. 12.

Pole of verticity. See *pole*².

verticler (vēr'ti-kl), n. [ < L. verticula, verticulum, a joint, dim. (cf. vertex, a whirl), < verte, turn about: see *vers*¹, and cf. vertebra.] An axis; a hinge. Waterhouse.

Verticordia (vēr'ti-kōr'di-ā), n. [NL., < L. Verticordia, a name of Venus, < verte, turn, + cor (cord-), heart.] 1. [De Candolle, 1826, so named because closely akin to the myrtle, sacred to Venus.] A genus of plants, of the order Myrtaceæ and tribe Chamælauciceæ. It is characterized by five or ten calyx-lobes deeply divided into subulate plumose or hair-like segments, and by ten stamens alternate with as many staminodes. The 40 species are all Australian. They are smooth heath-like shrubs with small entire opposite leaves. The white, pink, or yellow flowers are solitary in the upper axils, sometimes forming broad leafy corymbs, or terminal spikes. Some of the species are cultivated under glass, under the name of juniper-myrtle.

2. [S. Wood, 1844.] In conch., the typical genus of Verticordiidae.

Verticordiidae (vēr'ti-kōr'di-i-dē), n. pl. [ < Verticordia + -idae.] A family of dimyarian bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Verticordia. The animal has the mantle-margins mostly connected, the siphons sessile, and surrounded by a circular fringe and one pair of small branchiae. The shell is coriiform, nacreous inside, and the ligament is lodged in a subintertine groove, and has an ossicle.

vertiginate (vēr'tij'i-nāt), a. [ < LL. vertiginatus, pp. of vertiginare, whirl around, < L. vertigo (-gin-), a whirling: see vertigo.] Turned round; giddy. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Vertiginidae (vēr-tij'in'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vertigo (-gin-) + -idae.] A family of pulmonate gastropods, typified by the genus Vertigo, generally united with Pupidae or Helicidae.

vertiginous (vēr'tij'i-nus), a. [= F. vertiginos = Sp. Pg. It. vertiginoso, < L. vertigo (-gin-), a whirling in the head: see vertigo.] 1. Turning round; whirling; rotary: as, a vertiginous motion.

The love of money is a vertiginous pool, sucking all into it to destroy it. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 300.

2. Affected with vertigo; giddy; dizzy. Jer. Taylor, Repentance, iii. § 3.—3. Apt to turn or change; unstable.

"He that robs a church shall be like a wheel," of a vertiginous and unstable estate.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 124.

4. Apt to make one giddy; inducing giddiness: as, a vertiginous height.

The vertiginous disease is not so strong with them that are on the ground as with them that stand on the top of a steeple.

Baxter, Self-Denial, Epistle Montory.

vertiginously (vēr'tij'i-nus-li), adv. In a vertiginous manner; with a whirling or giddiness.

vertiginousness (vēr'tij'i-nus-nes), n. The state or character of being vertiginous; giddiness; a whirling, or sense of whirling; dizziness.

vertigo (vēr'tijō, now usually vēr'tijō), n. [= F. vertige = Sp. vertigo = Pg. vertigem = It. vertigine, < L. vertigo (-gin-), a turning or whirling round, dizziness, giddiness, < verte, turn, turn about: see *vers*¹. Cf. tiego.] 1. Dizziness; giddiness; a condition in which the individual or the objects around him appear to be whirling about. It is called subjective vertigo when the patient seems to himself to be turning, and objective vertigo when it is the surrounding objects that appear to move.

Our drink shall be prepared gold and amber,
Which we will take until my roof whirl round
With the vertigo. B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6.

That old vertigo in his head
Will never leave him till he's dead.
Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

2. [cap.] [NL.] In conch., a genus of pulmonates, typical of the family Vertiginidae.—Auditory or aural vertigo, Ménière's disease: an affection in which the prominent symptoms are vertigo, deafness, and ringing in the ears: supposed to be a disease of the labyrinth of the ear. — Essential vertigo, vertigo for which no cause can be discovered. — Ocular vertigo, See ocular. — Paralyzing vertigo, a disease observed in the vicinity of Geneva, Switzerland, manifesting itself in diurnal paroxysms of ptosis, vertigo, paresis of various parts, and severe rachialgia, lasting seldom more than two minutes. It occurs mostly in summer, and affects mainly males who work on farms. Also called Gertier's disease.

vertue¹, vertulest. Old spellings of virtue, virtueless.

vertumnal, a. [Irreg. < L. ver, spring, with term. as in autumnal.] Vernal.

Her [mystical city of peace] breath is sweeter than the new-blown rose; millions of souls lie sucking their life from it; and the smell of her garments is like the smell of Lebanon. Her smiles are more reviving than the vertumnal sunshine. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 333.

Vertumnus (vēr-tum-nus), n. [L., the god of the changing year, he who turns or changes himself, < verte, turn, change, + -umnus, a formative (= Gr. -μενός) of the ppr. mid. of verbs. Cf. alumnus.] 1. An ancient Roman deity who presided over gardens and orchards, and was worshipped as the god of spring or of the seasons in general.—2. [NL.] In zool., a generic name variously applied to certain worms, beetles, and amphipods.

vertuous, a. An old spelling of virtuous.

veru (vēr'ō), n. [L.] A spit.—Veru montanum, an oblong rounded projection on the floor of the prostatic section of the urethra: same as crista urethrae (which see, under crista).

verucoust, a. A bad spelling of verrucous.

Verulamian (vēr-ō-lā-mi-an), a. [ < Verulam (ML. Verulamium, Verolamium), an ancient British city near the site of St. Albans.] Of or pertaining to St. Albans, or Francis Bacon (1561–1626), Baron Verulam, Viscount St. Albans.

A temper well fitted for the reception of the Verulamian doctrine. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

veruled (vēr'ōld), a. [ < verule-s + -ed.] In her., ringed: noting a hunting-horn or similar bearing when the rings around it are of a different tincture from the rest. Also virole, virole.

verules (vēr'ōlz), n. [Pl. of verule, var. of virole, ferule.] In her., a bearing consisting of several small rings one within another concentrically. Also called vires.

vervain (vēr'vān), n. [Formerly also vervaine, verveine, verveine, vervina; < OF. verveine = Sp. Pg. It. verbenā, vervain, < L. verbenā, a green bough, etc., one of a class of plants used as cooling remedies, hence later verbenā, vervain: see verbenā.] One of several weedy plants of the genus Verbenā, primarily V. officinalis, widely dispersed in warm and temperate regions in both hemispheres. It is a plant a foot or two high, with spreading wiry branches, and very small flowers in slender racemes. It had sacred associations with the Druids, as indeed among the Romans; it has been worn as an amulet, held to be serviceable to witches and against them, used in love-philters, and credited with virtue against a variety of diseases. In Christian times it became associated with the cross, whence much of its repute. It is also called June's-tears, holy-herb, herb-of-grace or herb of the cross, and pigeon's-grass. (See pigeon's-grass.) The plant has a bitterish and astringent taste, and perhaps some slight febrifugal and other virtue, but is replaced by better remedies. In America several other verbenas receive the name, as V. hastata, the blue vervain, a tallish slender plant with small blue flowers, V. stricta, the hoary vervain, a hairy plant with larger purple flowers, and V. urticifolia, the white or nettle-leaved vervain, with small white flowers.

With reverence place
The vervain on the altar.

B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 4.

And thou, light vervain too, thou must go after,
Provoking easy souls to mirth and laughter.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, ii. 2.

Bastard or false vervain. See Stachytarpheta.—Stinking vervain. See stink.

vervain-mallow (vēr'vān-māl'ō), n. A species of mallow, Malva Alcea.

verve (vēr'v), n. [ < F. verve, rapture, animation, spirit, caprice, whim.] Enthusiasm, especially in what pertains to art and literature; spirit; energy.

If he be above Virgil, and is resolved to follow his own verve (as the French call it), the proverb will fall heavily upon him, Who teaches himself has a fool for his master. Dryden, Ded. of the Æneid.

verveinet, n. An obsolete form of vervain.

verveled (vēr'veld), a. In her., same as varveled.

vervelle (vēr'vel'), n. [F.: see varvels.] In medieval armor, a small staple or loop, especially one of those attached to the steel head-piece, through which the lace was passed for attaching the camail.

vervels (vēr'velz), n. pl. Same as carrels.

vervet (vēr'vet), n. A South African monkey, Cercopithecus pygerythrus, or C. lalandi. It is one of the so-called green monkeys, closely allied to the grivet. Vervets are among the monkeys carried about by organ-grinders.

vesiculate (vē-sik'ū-lăt), a. [< NL. vesiculatus, < L. vesicula, a little bladder or blister: see vesicle.] Having a vesicle or vesicles; formed into or forming vesicular tissue; vesicular.

vesiculate (vē-sik'ū-lăt), v. i.; pret. and pp. vesiculated, ppr. vesiculating. [< vesiculate, a.] To become vesicular.

vesiculation (vē-sik'ū-lăt'shən), n. [< vesiculate + -ion.] The formation of vesicles; vesication; a number of vesicles or blebs, as of the skin in some diseases; also, a vesicular or bladdery condition; inflation.

vesicle (ves'i-kül), n. [< F. vésicule: see vesicle.] Same as vesicle.

vesiculi, n. Plural of vesiculus.

Vesiculiferi (vē-sik'ū-lif'ē-ri), n. pl. [NL., pl. of vesiculifer: see vesiculosus and -fer.] Same as Physomyctes.

vesiculiferous (vē-sik'ū-lif'ē-rus), a. [< L. vesicula, a vesicle, + ferre = F. bear.] Producing or bearing vesicles; vesiculate; physophorous.

vesiculiform (vē-sik'ū-li-fōrm), a. [< L. vesicula, a vesicle, + forma, form.] Like a vesicle; vesicular; bladdery.

vesiculobronchial (vē-sik'ū-lō-brong'ki-al), a. Combining vesicular and bronchial qualities; applied to a respiratory sound. Vesiculobronchial respiratory murmur. See respiratory.

vesiculocavernous (vē-sik'ū-lō-kav'ēr-nus), a. Partaking of both vesicular and cavernous qualities; applied to a respiratory sound. Vesiculocavernous respiration. See respiration.

Vesiculosa, Vesiculosæ (vē-sik'ū-lō'sā, -sē), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), neut. or fem. pl. of L. vesiculosus, full of bladders or blisters: see vesiculosus.] In entom., a family of dipterous insects, the vesicular flies, having a bladdery abdomen; the Cyrtidae or Aeroceidae.

vesiculose (vē-sik'ū-lōs), a. [< L. vesiculosus, full of bladders: see vesiculosus.] Full of vesicles; vesiculate; vesicular.

vesiculotubular (vē-sik'ū-lō-tū'bū-lār), a. Combining vesicular and tubular qualities; applied to a respiratory sound. Vesiculotubular respiration, a respiratory sound in which the normal vesicular murmur is heard, but with an added tubular or blowing quality.

vesiculotympanic (vē-sik'ū-lō-tim-pa-nit'ik), a. Partaking of both vesicular and tympanic qualities; applied to a percussion note. Vesiculotympanic resonance. See resonance.

vesiculosus (vē-sik'ū-lus), a. [= F. vésiculeux, < L. vesiculosus, full of bladders or blisters, < vesicula, a little bladder or blister: see vesicle.] Same as vesiculose.

vesiculus (vē-sik'ū-lus), n.; pl. vesiculi (-li). Same as vesicle. Encyc. Brit., XII. 551. [Rare.]

Vespa (ves'pā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758), < L. vespa, a wasp. = E. wasp, q. v.] A Linnaean genus of aculeate hymenopterous insects, formerly of great extent, now restricted to certain social wasps and hornets of the modern family Vespidæ, as the common wasp, V. vulgaris, and the common hornet, V. crabro. See cuts under hornet and wasp. It at first corresponded to Latreille's family Diptera, but is now restricted to forms having the abdomen sessile, broad and truncate at the base, metathorax very short and truncate, and the basal nervure of the fore wings joining the subcostal at some distance before the stigma. They are short-bodied wasps with folded wings, and are commonly known in the United States as yellow-jackets or hornets. Their nests consist of a series of combs arranged one below another, and enveloped in a papery covering. In tropical regions these nests reach an immense size, those of a Ceylonese species often measuring 6 feet in length. Twenty species occur in the United States and 14 in Europe. V. maculata of North America is the so-called white-faced hornet, and is isotypical with the European V. crabro. The latter has been introduced into the United States, and occurs in New York and New England.

vesper (ves'pēr), n. [< ME. vesper, the evening star, < OF. vespre, evening, the evening star, vespres, even-song, vespers, F. vèpre, evening, vèpres, vespers, = Sp. vespéro, the evening star, = Pg. vespero, the evening star, = It. vespero, evening, the evening star, vespers, vespro, vespers, < L. vesper, evening, even, eventide, the evening star, poet. the west, the inhabitants of the west, also, and more frequently, fem. vespera, the evening, eventide, = Gr. ἑσπερος, evening, the evening star, Hesper, of the evening, ἑσπέρα, evening, = OBulg. večerŭ = Serv. Bohem. večer = Pol. wieczor = Russ. večerŭ, evening, = Lth. vakaras = Lett. vakars, evening; akin to Skt. vasatī, night, and to E. west. Cf. Hesper.] 1. The evening star, a name given to the planet Venus when she is east of the sun and appears after sunset; hence, the evening.

Black vesper's pageants. Shak., A. and C., iv. 14. 8.

2. pl. [< LL. vespera, ML. vesperæ, < vespera, evening.] In the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, and in religious houses and as a devotional office in the Anglican Church, the sixth or next to the last of the canonical hours. The observance of this hour is mentioned in the third century by St. Cyprian. The chief features of the Western vespers, besides the psalms and varying hymn, are the Magnificat and the collect for the day. The chief features of the Greek vespers (ἑσπερινός) are the psalms, the ancient hymn "Joyful Light," the prokeimenon, and the Nunc Dimittis. The old English name for vespers is even-song. The Anglican public evening prayer, also called even-song, is mainly a combination and condensation of the Sarum vespers and complin, the part of the office from the first Lord's Prayer to the Magnificat inclusive representing vespers. [Occasionally used in the singular.]

They [the priests] concluded that dayes ceremonies with their Vespera.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 40.

The far bell of vesper, . . .
Seeming to weep the dying day's decay.

Byron, Don Juan, iii. 108.

Sicilian Vespers. See Sicilian. Vesper mouse. See vesper-mouse.

vesperal (ves'pēr-al), a. and n. [< LL. vesperalis, of the evening, < L. vesper, vespera, evening: see vesper.] 1. a. Relating to the evening or to vespers. [Rare.]

II. n. That part of the antiphonarium which contains the chants for vespers. Lee's Glossary.

vesper-bell (ves'pēr-bel), n. The bell that summons to vespers.

Hark the little vesper-bell,
Which biddeh me to prayer!
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, vii.

vesper-bird (ves'pēr-bērd), n. The common bay-winged bunting of the United States, Poocetes gramineus; so called from its song, often heard as the shades of night fall. See Poocetes, and cut under grassfinch. J. Burroughs.

Vesperimus (ves-per'i-mus), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1874), < L. vesper, the evening, hence the west, + mus, mouse.] The leading genus of American vesper-mice, having as type the common white-footed deer-mouse of North America, usually called Hesperomys leucopus. The name was originally proposed as a subgenus, but Hesperomys has lately (1891) been shown to be untenable in any sense, and by the rules of nomenclature the species above mentioned must be called V. americanus (after Kerr, 1792). See cut under deer-mouse.

vesper-mouse (ves'pēr-mous), n.; pl. vespermice (-mis). A mouse of the genus Hesperomys or Vesperimus, or a related form; in the plural, native American mice and murine rodents collectively; the Sigmodontes, as distinguished from the Mures, indigenous to the Old World. See the technical words. S. F. Baird, 1857.

vesper-sparrow (ves'pēr-spar'ō), n. The vesper-bird. Coues.

Vespertilio (ves-pēr-til'i-ō), n. [*NL., < L. vespertilio(n-), a bat, so called from its flying about in the evening, prob. for *vespertilio(n-), < vespertinus, of the evening: see vespertine.*] A Linnaean genus of mammals, the fourth and last genus of the Linnaean order Primates, containing 6 species, and coextensive with the modern order Chiroptera. Most of the longer-known bats have been placed in Vespertilio. By successive eliminations, the genus has been restricted to about 40 small species, of both hemispheres, as the pipistrelle of Europe, P. pipistrellus, and the little brown bat of the United States, V. subulatus. The genus now includes only the smallest and most delicately formed bats, like those just named, having ample wings, the tail inclosed in the interfemoral membrane, no leafy appendage to the nose, no special development of the ears, six grinding teeth in each half of each jaw, and four upper and six lower incisors. See bat and Vespertilionidæ.

Vespertilionidæ (ves-pēr-til-i-on'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vespertilio(n-) + -idæ.] A family of chiropterous mammals, of which the genus Vespertilio is the type, belonging to the naked-nosed section (Gymnorrhina) of insectivorous or microchiropterous bats. It is distinguished, like other Gymnorrhina, from the Histiophora, or leaf-nosed section, by the absence of any nasal appendage, and from the true blood-sucking bats by the character of the dentition and digestive organs, and from other Gymnorrhina by having the tail inclosed in an ample interfemoral membrane, and special characters of the teeth and skull. The nearest relationships are with the molossid bats (Molossidæ and Noctilionidæ). The family contains numerous genera, as Vespertilio, Synotus, Plecotus, Atalapha, Antrozous, Nycticeus, Lasiurus, etc., and about 150 species (or more than one third of the whole order Chiroptera) of small bats of most parts of the world. Some of these are also very rich in individuals, and among the best-known representatives of the whole order. The family is primarily divided into two subfamilies, Vespertilioninæ and Nycticejinæ. See cut under Synotus.

Vespertilioninæ (ves-pēr-til'i-ō-ni'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vespertilio(n-) + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Vespertilionidæ, containing about nine tenths of the family, and represented by Vespertilio and about 6 other genera.

vespertilionine (ves-pēr-til'i-ō-nin), a. and n. [< Vespertilio(n-) + -inæ.] 1. a. Resembling a bat of the restricted genus Vespertilio; of or pertaining to the subfamily Vespertilioninæ. Vespertilionine alliance, one of two series of microchiropterous bats, having the tail inclosed in the interfemoral membrane and a diastema between the middle upper incisors, containing the families Rhinolophidæ, Nycticejidæ, and Vespertilionidæ. The tribe is contrasted with the emballonurine alliance.

II. n. A bat of the subfamily Vespertilioninæ or of the vespertilionine alliance.

vespertinal (ves'pēr-tin-al), a. [< vespertine + -al.] Same as vespertine. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 73.

vespertine (ves'pēr-tin), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. vespertino, < L. vespertinus, of or belonging to the evening, < vesper, evening: see vesper.] 1. Of or pertaining to the evening; happening or being in the evening. Sir T. Herbert.—2. In bot., opening in the evening, as a flower.—3. [cap.] In geol., noting one of Prof. H. D. Rogers's divisions of the Paleozoic series in Pennsylvania. It corresponds to No. X of the numbered series of the Pennsylvania Survey, and includes the Pocono sandstone and Conglomerate, forming the base of the Carboniferous, and lying immediately beneath the Mauch Chunk Red Shale (the "Unbral" of Rogers's nomenclature). See Pocono sandstone, under sandstone.

4. In zool., crepuscular; flying or otherwise specially active in the twilight of evening, as an insect, a bat, or a bird: as, the vespertine or evening grosbeak, Hesperiphona vespertina.—5. In astron., descending from the meridian to the horizon at the time of sunset.

Vesperugo (ves-pe-rō'gō), n. [NL. (Keyserling and Blasius), < L. vesperugo, a bat, < vesper, evening: see vesper, and cf. Vespertilio.] The most extensive genus of bats of the family Vespertilionidæ and subfamily Vespertilioninæ, typified by the European V. scrocinus. They have the incisors  $\frac{3}{2}$  or  $\frac{3}{1}$ , the premolars  $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{3}{2}$ , or  $\frac{3}{1}$ , and a well-developed post-calcanal lobule of the interfemoral membrane. They are divided into several subgenera, as Vesperugo, Scotozous, Rhinoglossa, and Lasiomyotis. The genus is remarkable for its wide distribution in both hemispheres, extending from near the arctic circle to the Strait of Magellan.

vespiary (ves'pi-ā-ri), n.; pl. vespiaries (-riz). [*Prop. *vespy (the form vespiary being irreg. conformed to apiary), < L. vespa, a wasp: see wasp.*] A hornets' nest; the habitation of social wasps; also, the colony or aggregate of wasps in such a nest. See Vespa, and cut under wasp, and compare apiary and formicary.

Vespidæ (ves'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Stephens, 1829), < Vespa + -idæ.] A family of dipterous aculeate hymenopterous insects, typified by the genus Vespa; the social wasps and hornets. They are characterized by their two-spurred middle tibiae and simple tarsal claws. Every species exists in the three forms of male, female or queen, and worker. The males and workers die in the fall, and the impregnated queen alone hibernates. She forms a new colony in the spring, giving birth at first only to workers, and later to males and females. The nests are made of paper, and the young are fed by the workers with nectar and animal and vegetable juices. The principal genera besides Vespa are Polistes and Polybia. See Vespa, and cuts under wasp, hornet, and Polistes.

vespiform (ves'pi-fōrm), a. [< L. vespa, wasp, + forma, form.] Wasp-like; resembling a wasp or hornet to some extent or in some respects; noting certain moths. See hornet-moth.

vespillot (ves-pil'ō), n. [L., also vespulla, also, according to Festus, vespa, one of the bearers who carried out the bodies of dead poor at night, < vesper, evening: see vesper.] Among the Romans, one who carried out the dead in the evening for burial. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. § 38.

vespine (ves'pin), a. [< L. vespa, wasp, + -inæ.] Pertaining to wasps; wasp-like. Pop. Sci. Mo., IV. 176.

vessel (ves'el), n. [Early mod. E. also vessell; < ME. vessel, vesselle, fessel, < OF. vessel, veissel, vaissel, F. vaisseau = Sp. vasillo = Pg. vasilha = It. vascello, a vessel, < L. vascellum (in an inscription), a small vase or urn, dim. of vas, a vase, urn: see vase. In def. 6 the word is orig. collective. ME. vessel, vessell, < OF. *vesselle, vaisselle, F. vaisselle, vessels or plate collectively; < vessel, vaissel, a vessel: see above.] 1. A utensil for holding liquors and other things, as a cask, a barrel, a bottle, a kettle, a pot, a cup, or a dish.

The Arm and the Hond (that he putte in oure Lordes syde, whan he appered to him, afre his Resurreioun . . .) is zit lyggynge in a Vesselle with outen the Tombe.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 172.

Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.
Ps. ii. 9.

The empty vessel makes the greatest sound.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 4. 73.

As a garment covering the person; an undergarment or waistcoat. [A. L. L.]

Over his lucid arms

A vestment of purple blue and

Milton, P. L., XI. 241

The rivets of the vest

Which girds in steel his ample breast.

Whittier, Mogg Megone, III.

2. Figuratively, garment; dress; array; vestiture.

Not seldom, clad in radiant vest,

Decently goes forth the morn.

Woodworth, Near the Spring of the Hermitage.

Whom it be thrown whatever vest

The being hath put on which lately here

So many-friended was. Lowell, Agassiz, VI. 2.

3. A body garment for men's wear, at different times of distinct types. An originally, a garment made of flax and by Egypt to have been adopted by the Greeks, the fashion for his coat and indicated by the XIV. of France, who put his servants into such vests.

You are not to learn,

At these Years, how absolutely necessary a rich Vest

And a Perruque are to a Man that aims at their [ladies']

Favours. Etherton, She Would if she Could, III. 3.

The vest is gathered up before them [figures on medals] like an apron, which you must suppose filled with fruits as well as the cornucopia. Addison, Ancient Medals, II.

Under his doublet Charles appeared in a vest, "being a long casock," as Pepys explains, "close to the body, of black cloth and pinked with white silk under it."

Encyc. Brit., VI. 473.

(b) A body-garment of later times; especially, the waistcoat in the ordinary modern sense—that is, a short garment without sleeves, buttoning down the front, and having the back concealed by the coat.

Numerous pegs with coats and "pants" and "vests"—as he was in the habit of calling waistcoats and pantaloons or trousers—hanging up as if the owner had melted out of them. D. W. Holmes, Professor, VII.

If tailors would only print upon waistcoats, I would give double price for a vest bearing this inscription.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, LXVI.

4. An outer garment, or part of such a garment, for women. Especially—(a) A sort of jacket with or without sleeves, and known by many different names according to changing fashion, as, Breton vest, Oriental vest, etc. (b) A trimming or facing of the front of the bodice, sometimes with a different material, and following more or less closely the form of a man's vest; a fashion often respecting over the vest of this form a coat is generally worn.

5. An undergarment knitted or woven on the stocking-loom. Vest and undervest are more common in England; undershirt in the United States.

vest (vest), v. [OF. vestir, F. vêtir = Sp. Pg. vestir = It. vestire, L. vestire, clothe, dress, < vestis, a garment, clothing; see vest, n. Cf. vestal, v.] I. trans. 1. To clothe with or as with a garment, vest, or vestment; robe; dress; cover, surround, or encompass closely.

Vested all in white, pure as her mind.

Milton, Sonnets, xviii.

2. To invest or clothe, as with authority; put in possession (of); endow; put more or less formally in occupation (of); followed by with.

To settle men's consciences, 'tis necessary that they know the person who by right is vested with power over them. Locke.

Had I been vested with the Monarch's Pow'r,

Thou must have sigh'd, unlucky Youth, in vain.

Prior, To Mr. Howard.

3. To place or put in possession or at the disposal of; give or confer formally or legally an immediate fixed right of present or future possession, occupancy, or enjoyment of; commit to; followed by in.

So, instead of getting licenses in mortmain to enable him to vest his lands in the Guild of the Holy Cross, he made a deed of feoffment, vesting them in persons therein named. English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 252.

I will not trust executive power, vested in the hands of a single magistrate, to keep the vigils of liberty.

D. Webster, Speech, Senate, May 7, 1834.

4. To lay out, as money or capital; invest; as, to vest money in land. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

II. intrans. 1. To put on clothing or vestments.

Even in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was the common custom for priests, at least in England, to vest in the sanctuary. Cath. Dict., p. 338.

2. To come or descend; devolve; take effect, as a title or right; with on.

The supreme power could not be said to vest in them exclusively. Brownson.

It is already the usage to speak of a trust as a thing that vests, and as a thing that may be divested. Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 27, note.

To vest in interest, to pass or devolve as matter of right.

To vest in possession, to pass in possession or immediate right of possession. See vested.

Vesta (ves'ta), n. [L. = Gr. Tēra, the goddess of the hearth, < vas, Skt. < ush, burn:

see ustion, Aurora, Eastere.] 1. One of the chief divinities of the ancient Romans, equivalent to the Greek Hestia, one of the twelve great Olympians, the virgin goddess of the hearth, presiding over both the private family altar and the central altar of the city, the tribe, or the race. She was worshiped along with the Penates at every meal, when the family assembled round the altar or hearth, which was in the center of the house. Aeneas was said to have carried the sacred fire (which was her symbol) from Troy, and brought it to Italy, and it was preserved at Rome by the state in the sanctuary of the goddess, which stood in the Forum. To guard this fire from becoming extinguished, it was watched and tended by six stainless virgins, called vestales. The Roman temples of Vesta were circular, preserving the form of the primitive huts of the Latin race, because it was in such a hut that the sacred fire was first tended by the young girls while their parents and brothers were absent in the chase or pasture ground. See also cuts under hut urn and monopteron.

The Giustiniani Statue of Vesta (Hestia). Louvre Museum, Rome.

2. The fourth planetoid, discovered by Olbers, at Bremen, in 1807.—3. [l. c.] A wax match which may be ignited by friction.

The door of a small closet here attracted the young man's attention; and, striking a vesta, he opened it and entered. R. L. Stevenson, The Dynamiter, p. 178.

vestal (ves'tal), a. and n. [= F. vestale, n., = Sp. Pg. vestal = It. vestale, < L. Vestalis, of Vesta, as a noun (see virgo) a vestal virgin. < Vesta, Vesta: see Vesta.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Vesta, the classical goddess of the sacred fire and of the household and the state.

When thou shouldst come,

Then my cot with light should shine

Purer than the vestal fire.

Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

2. Pertaining to or characteristic of a vestal virgin or a nun.

Vestal modesty.

Shak., R. and J., III. 3. 38.

My vestal habit me contenting more Than all the robes adorning me before.

Drayton, Matilda to King John.

II. n. 1. Among the ancient Romans, a virgin consecrated to Vesta and to the service of watching the sacred fire, which was kept perpetually burning upon her altar. The vestals were at first four in number, afterward six. They entered the service of the goddess at from six to ten years of age, their term of service lasting thirty years. They were then permitted to retire and to marry, but few did so, for, as vestals, they were treated with great honor, and had important public privileges. Their persons were inviolable, any offense against them being punished with death, and they were treated in all their relations with the highest distinction and reverence. A vestal who broke her vow of chastity was immured alive in an underground vault amid public mourning. There were very few such instances; in one of them, under Domitian, the chief of the vestals was put to death under a false charge trumped up by the emperor.

Hence—2. A virgin; a woman of spotless chastity; sometimes, a virgin who devotes her life entirely to the service of religion; a nun; a religieuse.

Shall's go hear the vestals sing?

Shak., Pericles, IV. 5. 7.

She would a dedicated vestal prove,

And give her virgin vows to heaven and love.

Crabbe, Works, VII. 94.

3. In entom.: (a) The geometrid moth Sterrhra sacralia; popularly so called in England. (b) A gossamer-winged butterfly; any member of the Vestales.

Vestales (ves-tā'lez), n. pl. [NL.: see vestal.] A group of butterflies; the vestals, virgins, or gossamer-winged butterflies.

vestment, n. Same as vestment.

His vestments sit as if they grew upon him.

Massinger, Fatal Dowry, IV. 1.

vested (ves'ted), p. a. 1. Clothed; especially, wearing, or having assumed, state robes or some ceremonial costume; as, a vested choir.

A troop of yellow-vested white-haired Jews,

Bound for their own land, where redemption dawns.

Browning, Paracelsus, IV.

2. In her., clothed; draped; especially when the clothing is of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing. This blazon is more usual when only a part of the body is represented. Also clothed.—3. Not in a state of contingency or suspension; fixed. In law: (a) Already acquired, existing, in contemplation of law, in a certain person as owner, as a law is not to be construed so as to impair vested rights without compensation. See right. (b) Noting the quality of a present absolute right or interest, as distinguished from that which is defeasible. Thus, a legacy is said to be vested when given in such terms that the legatee has a present right to its future payment which is not defeasible, and he can therefore extinguish it by release. (c) Noting the quality of a present estate even though defeasible, as distinguished from that the very existence of which is contingent. Thus, a devise of land is said to be vested when the circumstances are such that the legatee is existing and known, and would be immediately entitled to possession were the precedent estate to terminate, although the time may not have come when he is entitled to receive it, and although it is possible that before that time comes another person may come into being who will take in preference to him. Meanwhile it is said to be vested in interest, but not vested in possession. Vested remainder. See remainder, 3.

vester (ves'tēr), n. One who invests money or other property; an investor. [Rare.]

But in another of their papers . . . they declare that their vesters aim at nothing short of a community in land and in goods. Southey, To W. S. Landor, Aug. 22, 1829.

vestiarian (ves-ti-ā'-ri-an), a. [< vestiary + -an.] Same as vestiary.

vestiary (ves'ti-ā'-ri), a. and n. [= F. vestiaire, a., = Sp. vestuario = Pg. vestiário, vestuário, n., = It. vestiario, a. and n., < L. vestiarius, of or pertaining to clothes, neut. vestiarius, a wardrobe, ML. a robing-room. vestry, < vestis, clothing; see vest. Cf. vestry.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to costume or dress. Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 93.

II. n.; pl. vestiaries (-riz). 1. A room or place for the keeping of vestments, garments, or clothes; a wardrobe. Fuller. [Rare].—2. Garb; clothing.

If I throw my cloak over a fugitive slave to steal him, it is so short and straight, so threadbare and chunky, that he would be recognized by the idlest observer who had seen him seven years ago in the market-place; but if thou hadst enveloped him in thy versicolored and cloudlike vestiary, puffed and effuse, rustling and rolling, nobody could guess well what animal was under it, much less what man. Landor, Imag. Conv., Diogenes and Plato.

3. a. Vestibule; a place of entrance; a court. Thei wenten . . . in the hows of a manner man in Bahurym, that had a pit in his vestiary. Wyclif, 2 Ki. [Sam.] xvii. 18.

vestibula, n. Plural of vestibulum.

vestibular (ves-tib'ū-lār), a. [< vestibule + -ar.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a vestibule, in any sense.—Vestibular artery, a branch of the internal auditory artery distributed, in the form of a minute capillary network, in the substance of the membranous labyrinth.—Vestibular membrane. Same as membrane of Reissner (which see, under membrane).—Vestibular nerve, the branch of the auditory nerve distributed to the vestibule.—Vestibular passage. Same as scala vestibuli (which see, under scala).—Vestibular sacculus or sacculus. See sacculus.—Vestibular seta, the bristle that projects from the vestibule of the Vorticellidae: originally called in French soie de Lachmann. W. S. Kent.

vestibulate (ves-tib'ū-lāt), a. [< vestibule + -ate.] In anat. and zool., having a vestibule, in any sense; formed into a vestibule; vestibular. vestibule (ves'ti-būl), n. [(F. vestibule = Sp. vestibulo = Pg. It. vestibulo, < L. vestibulum, a forecourt, entrance-court, an entrance; variously explained: (a) 'a place separated from the (main) abode,' < ve-, apart, + stabulum, abode (see stable); (b) 'abode,' < √ ves, Skt. √ vas, dwell (see vas); (c) possibly 'the place where the outer clothing is put on or off as one goes out or comes in,' i. e. the place corresponding to that assigned to the modern hat-rack (cf. vestry), < vestis, garment, clothing.)] 1. A passage, hall, or antechamber next the outer door of a house, from which doors open into the various inner rooms; a porch; a lobby; a hall; a narthex. See cuts under opisthodomus, porch, and pronaos.

In the intention of the early builders of the church, the vestibule, or atrium, was regarded as that portion of the sacred building which was appropriated to those who had not been received into the full standing of members of the Church of Christ.

C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 186.

2. In anat.: (a) A part of the labyrinth of the ear, the common or central cavity, between the semicircular canals and the cochlea, communicating permanently with the former, and temporarily or permanently with the latter, from the proper membranous cavity of which it is generally shut off subsequently, opening into the tympanum or middle ear by the fenestra ovalis, which, however, is closed in life by a membrane. See cuts under ear and temporal. (b) A triangular space between the nymphæ or labia mi-nora of the human female and some anthropoid apes, containing the orifice of the urethra, or meatus urinarius. More fully called vestibule of the vulva and vestibulum vaginae. (c) A part of the left ventricular cavity of the heart, adjoining the root of the aorta.—3. In zool.: (a) A depression of the body-wall of sundry infusorians, as Paramecium and Noctiluca, leading to the oral and sometimes also to the anal aperture, and thus connected, by means of an esophageal canal, with the endosarc. See Vorticella, Noctiluca, and cut under Paramecium. (b) In polyzoans, an outer chamber of a cell of the polyzoary, which opens on the surface, and into which, in some forms, the pharynx and anus both open.—Aortic vestibule. See aortic.—Common sinus of the vestibule. Same as utricule, 2.—Membranous vestibule, the membranous sac contained within the osseous vestibule, in some animals, as in man, divided into a larger section, the utricle or utriculus, and a lesser, the sacculus or sacculus.—Osseous vestibule, the bony cavity in the petrosal bone, in nearly all vertebrates inclosed by the prootic, epiotic, and opisthotic bones, and inclosing the membranous vestibule.—Pyramid of the vestibule. See pyramid.—Utricle of the vestibule. See utricle.—Vestibule of the larynx, that part of the laryngeal cavity which lies above the false vocal cords.—Vestibule of the mouth, the cavity of the mouth outside of the teeth, technically called vestibulum oris.—Vestibule of the pharynx, the fauces; the passage from the mouth to the pharynx, bounded laterally by the pillars of the fauces.—Vestibule of the vulva. See def. 2 (b).—Vestibule train. See vestibule, v. t.—Syn. 1. See definitions of porch, portico, hall, lobby, passage.

vestibule (ves'ti-būl), v. t.; pret. and pp. vestibuled, ppr. vestibuling. [< vestibule, n.] To provide with a vestibule.—Vestibuled train, a train of parlor-cars each of which is provided with a "vestibule" at each end—that is, a part of the platform is so inclosed at the sides that when the cars are connected together a continuous passage from car to car is formed. [U. S.]

vestibulum (ves-tib'ū-lum), n.; pl. vestibula (-lā). [NL.: see vestibule.] In anat. and zool., a vestibule.—Aquæductus vestibuli. See aquæductus.—Pyramis vestibuli. See pyramis.—Scala vestibuli. See scala.—Utriculus vestibuli. Same as utricle, 2.—Vestibulum oris, the vestibule of the mouth (which see, under vestibule).—Vestibulum vaginae. vestigatē (ves'ti-gāt), v. t. [< L. vestigatus, pp. of vestigare, track, trace out, < vestigium, a footprint, track; see vestige. Cf. investigate.] To investigate.

vestige (ves'tij), n. [(F. vestige = Sp. Pg. It. vestigio, < L. vestigium, footprint, track, mark.)] 1. A footprint; a footstep; a track; a trace; hence, a mark, impression, or appearance of something which is no longer present or in existence; a sensible evidence or visible sign of something absent, lost, or perished; remains of something passed away.

Scarce any trace remaining, vestige gray,
Or nodding column on the desert shore,
To point where Corinth, or where Athens stood.

Thomson, Liberty, ii.

I could discover no vestiges of common houses in Dendera more than in any other of the great towns in Egypt. Bruce, Source of the Nile, i. 105.

What vestiges of liberty or property have they left?

Burke, Rev. in France.

2. In biol., any vestigial organ or tissue, having little or no utility, but corresponding to a useful part existing in some lower animal. See vestigial and rudiment, 3.—Syn. See trace.

vestigia, n. Plural of vestigium.

vestigial (ves-tij'i-āl), a. [< L. vestigium, footprint (see vestige), + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a vestige; like a mere trace of what has been; also, rudimentary. In biology vestigial has a specific application to those organs or structures which are commonly called rudimentary, and are rudimentary in fact, but which are properly regarded, not as beginnings or incipient states, but as remains of parts or structures which have been better developed in an earlier stage of existence of the same organism, or in lower preceding organisms, and have aborted or atrophied, or become otherwise reduced or rudimentary in the evolution of the individual or of the species. Thus, the parovaria, the canals of Gartner, the male womb, the urachus, and the round ligament of the liver are vestigial structures with reference to the Wolfian bodies and allantois of the fetus; the thymus of the adult is vestigial with reference to that structure in the infant; the vermiform appendix of the colon is vestigial with reference to the very large cæcum of a ruminant; the stunted coracoid process of the scapula of a mammal is a vestigial structure with reference to the large articulated coracoid bone of a bird. Vestigial structures of any kind, or the remains of what has been, are to be carefully distinguished from rudimentary structures, or the beginning of what is to be (as fully explained under rudimentary). They are very significant biological facts, of which much use has been made by Darwin and other modern evolutionists in tracing lines of descent with modification and determining probable ancestry.—Vestigial fold, a projection of the pericardium over the root of the left lung, caused by a cord which is the remains of the nearly obliterated ductus Cuvieri, or sinus of Cuvier, of the fetus.—Vestigial muscle, a muscle, like those of the external ear, which is of use in the lower animals, but poorly developed and scarcely functional in man.—Syn. Abortive, etc. See rudimentary.

vestigiary (ves-tij'i-ā-ri), a. [< L. vestigium, footprint, + -ary.] Vestigial.

vestigium (ves-tij'i-um), n.; pl. vestigia (-iā). [L.: see vestige.] In anat., a vestige; a vestigial structure of any kind; a trace, as the pit which marks the closed foramen ovale between the right and left auricles of the heart.—Vestigium foraminis ovalis, the fovea or fossa ovalis.—Vestigia rerum, traces of things. See the quotation.

It is not to be doubted that those motions which give rise to sensation leave in the brain changes of its substance which answer to what Haller called "vestigia rerum," and to what that great thinker, David Hartley, termed "Vibratuncles."

Huxley, Address before the British Association at Belfast, 1874.

vestment, n. An obsolete variant of vestment. vesting (ves'ting), n. [< vest + -ing.] Cloth especially made for men's waistcoats: most commonly in the plural.

vestiture (ves'ti-tūr), n. [< L. vestire, pp. vestitus, dress, clothe (see vest), + -ure. Cf. vesture, investiture.] 1. The manufacture or preparation of cloth. R. Parke.—2. Investiture.—3. In zool., the hairs, scales, etc., covering a surface: as, the vestiture of the thorax of an insect.

vestlet (vest'let), n. [< vest + -let.] A tubiculous sea-anemone of the genus Cerianthus, as C. borealis. It is not fixed to any support, and remarkably resembles a cephalobranchiate worm, having a long, smooth, slender body or stalk tapering to a free base, and surmounted by a large double wreath of tentacles. The stem is a tube secreted by the polyp and investing it (whence the name). It is 6 or 8 inches long, and the wreath expands an inch or more.

See Cerianthus, and compare cut under Edwardsia.

vestment (vest'ment), n. [Formerly also vestiment, vestment; < ME. vestment, < OF. vestment, F. vêtement = Sp. vestimento, m., vestimenta, f., = Pg. vestimenta = It. vestimento, m., vestimenta, f., < L. vestimentum, clothing, covering, < vestire, clothe: see vest, v.] 1. A covering or garment; some part of clothing or dress; an article of clothing; especially, some part of outer clothing; specifically, a ceremonial or official robe or garment.

Hir vestments which that they were.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2090.

The judges in their vestments of state attended to give advice on points of law. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. Eccles.: (a) One of the garments worn, in addition to the cassock and ordinary dress, by the clergy and their assistants, choristers, etc., during divine service and the administration of the sacraments; especially, one of the garments so worn by the celebrant, deacon, and subdeacon during the celebration of the eucharist; specifically, the chasuble, or the chasuble with the other eucharistic garments and ornaments, especially the amice, stole, and maniple. From monumental and other evidence it appears that the type of the principal ecclesiastical vestments has always been the nearly the same; that this agreed on the whole with the general style of dress among Greeks, Romans, and Orientals; and that in certain respects it agreed with official rather than common civil dress and with Syrian rather than Greek or Roman costume. (b) One of the cloths or coverings of the altar.

vestral (ves'tral), a. [< vestry + -al.] Of or pertaining to a vestry.

vestrify (ves'tri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. vestrified, ppr. vestrifying. [< vestry + -fy.] To make a vestry of, or make like a vestry; turn into a vestry. [Rare.]

In the debate in the House of Commons on the Redistribution of Seats Bill, Dec. 4, 1884, Mr. Chaplin said it would "tend to vestrify the House of Commons."

vesuvianite (ves'u-vi-ən-ī-t), n. [< Vesuvius + -ite.] A mineral occurring in tetragonal crystals of a brown to green color, rarely yellow or blue. It is a silicate of aluminum, calcium, and iron, and was first found on Mount Vesuvius (whence the name). Also called chlorite and gipsite. Xanthite, cypine, and white are varieties.

vesuviate (ves'u-vi-āt), v. i.; pret. and pp. vesuviated, ppr. vesuviating. To burst forth as a volcanic eruption. [Rare.]

It vesuviates. This sudden heat in the atmosphere has something to do with the eruption of the mountain which killed Pliny the elder.

Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, I. 166.

vesuvium (ves'u-vi-əm), n. Bismuth brown. It is used as a stain in histological examinations. See brown.

vesuvius (vē-sū'vi-us), n. Same as vesuvian. 2. Vesuvius-salt (vē-sū'vi-us-salt), n. Same as aphthalite.

vet (vet), n. A colloquial contraction of veterinary (surgeon).

Great pains are taken with the shoeing, which is under the direct charge of the accomplished vet employed by that department. The Atlantic, LXVI. 114.

veta (vē'tā), n. A condition characterized by nausea, throbbing headache, and vertigo, often experienced by unacclimatized persons in the punas or elevated table-lands of Peru and Bolivia. Also called puna.

vetanda (vē-tan'dā), n. pl. [Neut. pl. gerundive of vetare, forbid; see reto.] Things to be forbidden or prohibited.

In general design as well as in details this work [Win-stanley's Eddystone Light] must be placed among the vetanda of maritime engineering. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 615.

vetch (veh), n. [Also fitch, fetch (?) (see fitch 1); < ME. vech, also fiche, fiche, < OF. vech, vesse, later vesse, F. vesce = Sp. vesca = It. vesca, vesca = OHG. wiche, MIHG. G. wicke = D. wikke = Sw. vicker = Dan. rikke, < L. vicia, vetch, = Gr. vicia, vetch; akin to vinca, vinca, pernua (see pernua 1), < vici (✓ vic), bind; cf. bind = L. vitis, a vine, rimen, a pliant twig, < vit, bind; see ritus, rim, withy.] A plant of the genus Vicia; the tare. The species are mostly climbing herbs of moderate height; many of them are useful as wild or cultivated forage-plants. The common vetch, the species most largely cultivated, is V. sativa (see tare). V. pinnatifida and V. cordata are animals grown in Italy; and V. (Erinacea), Erinacea of the Mediterranean region, known as blue, bitter-vetch, is grown as a forage-plant on calcareous soils. V. tetrasperma, the lentil tare, is said to be better than the common vetch for sandy ground, and V. hirsuta the tare-vetch, and V. calcarata approach it in value. The wood-vetch, V. sylvestris, the bush-vetch, V. supina, and the tufted vetch, V. cracca, are perennials useful in pastures. The common bean of Europe is of the vetch genus, V. faba (see bean).

The name is extended to some kindred plants of other genera. Bastard hatchet-vetch, hirsuta Peucedanum, a climbing herb, the only species of its genus, having flat pods, which are extremely flattened contrary to the valves, thus bearing two false keels which are sinuate-dentate. — Bastard vetch, a plant of the forage-plant group, now included in Astragalus. — Bitter vetch, Erinacea, the name referring to the inflated pods. — Bladder-vetch, Erinacea, the name referring to the inflated pods. — Bush vetch. See def. — Chickling vetch, an annual a, flower.

herb, Lathyrus sativus, extensively grown in southern Europe as a forage-plant and for its seeds, which are used like those of the chick-pea. Its cultivation has sometimes been prohibited, as its continuous use is said to induce paralysis of the legs in man and animals. — Grass vetch. See grass-vetch. — Hairy vetch. Same as hairy-vetch. — Hatchet vetch. See hatchet-vetch. — Horse or horseshoe vetch, Hippocrepis comosa; so named from its curved pods, which were credited with drawing the shoes of horses that tread upon it; hence also called under-the-horse. See Hippocrepis. — Kidney vetch. See kidney-vetch. — Licorice-vetch, a milk vetch, Astragalus alpinus, having a sweet root. — Milk vetch. See milk-vetch. — Sensitive joint-vetch, a plant of the genus Asplenium. The pod is jointed, and the leaves in some species are sensitive. — Tare-vetch, the hairy vetch of tare, Vicia hirsuta. — Tufted vetch, Vicia cracca, a species found in the northern Old World and eastern North America, climbing 2 or 3 feet high, and bearing clusters of blue flowers, turning purple. See def. — Wood-vetch. See def.

vetchling (veh'ling), n. [< vetch + -ling.] In bot., a name given loosely to plants of the genus Lathyrus. The meadow-vetchling is L. pratensis, a plant difficult to eradicate, but useful for forage.

vetchy (veh'ī), a. [< vetch + -y.] Consisting of vetches or of pea-straw; abounding with vetches.

A vetchy bed. Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

veteran (vet'e-ran), a. and n. [= F. vétéran, n., = Sp. Pg. It. veterano, a. and n., < L. veteranus, old, aged, that has been long in use (in rural language, of cattle, slaves, vines, etc.), esp., of soldiers, old, experienced, < vetus (veter), also veter, old, aged, that has existed a long time, lit. 'advanced in years,' akin to veterna, f., veterinum (usually in pl.), a beast of burden, prob. orig. 'a beast a year old' or more, and to vitulus, a calf, lit. 'a yearling' (> ult. E. veal), < vetus (veter), a year. = Gr. βῆτος (vetos), orig. **Fētos* (Fetos), a year; cf. Skt. vatsa, a year. From the same L. source are ult. invertebrate, veterinary, and (< L. vitulus) E. veal, velum.] I. a. 1. Grown old in service. — 2. Hence — (a) Practised and skillful. (b) Entitled to consideration and allowance on account of long service. (c) In milit. matters, practised and accustomed to war, as distinguished from raw, newly enlisted, etc. A veteran soldier is one who has been through one or more campaigns, and has gained the steadiness and confidence which make him a trustworthy soldier.

The veteran warrior, with nearly a century of years upon his head, had all the fire and animation of youth at the prospect of a foray. Irving, Granada, p. 108.

3. Long-continued; of, pertaining to, or characteristic of a veteran or veterans.

Great and veteran service to the state. Longfellow.

II. n. One long practised, and therefore skilled and trustworthy, or entitled to consideration on account of past services; especially (milit.), a veteran soldier. See I., 2 (c).

Superfluous lags the vet on the stage. Johnson, Vanity of Human Wishes, I. 308.

The long-trained veteran scarcely winning hearts
The infallible strategy of volunteers Making through Nature's walls its easy breach.

Lowell, Agassiz, iii. 3.

veteran (vet'e-ran), v. i. [< veteran, a.] Same as veteranize. [Colloq., U. S.] veteranize (vet'e-ran-īz), v.; pret. and pp. veteranized, ppr. veteranizing. [< veteran + -ize.] I. trans. To make veteran.

During the civil war in the U. S. the proportion was at first a little over three pieces for one thousand infantry, but as the latter became more veteranized this was reduced. Johnson's Cyc. (revised ed.), I. 266.

II. intrans. To reenlist for service as a soldier; often abbreviated to veteran. [Colloq., U. S.] veterinarian (vet'e-ri-nā-ri-an), n. [< veterinary + -an.] One who practises the art of treating disease and injuries in domestic animals, surgically or medically.

The second assertion, that an horse hath no gall, is very general, not only swallowed by the people and common farriers, but also received by good veterinarians, and some who have laudably discoursed upon horses.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 2.

To the veterinarian a knowledge of the comparative anatomy of the domestic animals is essential to the study of their diseases. Encyc. Brit., VI. 225.

veterinary (vet'e-ri-nā-ri), a. and n. [= F. vétérinaire = Sp. Pg. It. veterinario, < L. veterinarius, of or belonging to beasts of burden, hence a cattle-doctor, < veterina (see bestia), veterinum (see animal or jumentum ?), beast of burden; see veteran.] I. a. Of or pertaining to domestic animals; specifically, pertaining to the surgical or medical treatment of domestic animals, especially of horses and cattle; as, a veterinary surgeon; veterinary medicine; a veterinary college or school.

II. n.; pl. veterinaries (-riz). A veterinarian. vetiver (vet'i-vér), n. [= F. vétiver, vétyver (Nl. vetivera), < E. Ind. véticayr (Littéré), a name given to the roots of the plant.] The cuscus-grass, Andropogon squarrosus (A. muricata), of India, the fibrous roots of which are made into tattles (see tatty). The rootstock and rootlets have a strong persistent odor compared to myrrh, and yield vetiver-oil, of modern use in European perfumery. In India an infusion is used as a cooling medicine.

veto (vē'tō), n. [= F. veto, < L. veto, I forbid (see def.)], 1st pers. pres. ind. act. of vetare, forbid, prohibit, oppose, hinder. 1. In a constitutional government, the right vested in one branch of it to negative the determinations of another branch; specifically, the right, under constitutional restrictions, of the executive, as a king, a president, or a governor, to reject a bill passed by the legislature; also, the act of exercising this right. This power is often traced to the privilege enjoyed by the Roman tribunes of annulling or suspending any measures of the senate, decree of a magistrate, etc., the word veto (I forbid) having been at least occasionally used by the tribune in such a case. This power of the tribunes was properly called intercessio. The attempt on the part of Louis XVI. of France to exercise the veto assured to him by the Constitution of 1791 was one of the causes of the revolutionary movements of 1792, which at once dethroned the king and overturned the Constitution. In Great Britain the power of the crown is confined to a veto, a right of rejecting and not resolving, and even this right has become practically obsolete, the last occasion of its exercise being in the reign of William III. The Constitution of the United States provides that "every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. . . . If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law." (Article I, Sec. 7.) Most of the State Constitutions have a similar provision.

A man who might be afraid to defeat a law by his single veto might not scruple to return it for re-consideration. A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 73.

Afterwards the veto message of President Jackson put an end to legislation upon local routes.

T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I. 26.

Veto. By this expression (Lat. veto, 'I forbid') is understood in public law the constitutional right of the competent authority, or in republics of the whole people in their primary assembly, to protest against a legislative or administrative act, and to prevent wholly, or for the time being, the validation or execution of the same.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 206.

2. Any right or power of authoritatively forbidding or effectively negating, or the exercise of such right or power; prohibition; interdict.

On George's intercourse with Amelia he put an instant veto. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xviii.

The rector had beforehand put a veto on any Dissenting chairman. George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxiv.

Absolute veto, a veto without restrictions.—Liberum veto, in the former kingdom of Poland, the privilege enjoyed by a single member of the diet of invalidating any measure.—Pocket veto. See pocket.—Suspensory veto, a veto to which certain conditions are attached.—Veto Act, an act passed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1834, decreeing that no one should be admitted a minister of any vacant church if a majority of the male heads of families in full communion with the church should dissent from his appointment. The Court of Session, and subsequently the House of Lords (in 1839), declared this act of the assembly to be illegal; and the dissensions that consequently arose within the church culminated in the disruption of 1843.

veto (vē'tō), v. t. [< veto, n.]. To forbid authoritatively; specifically, to negative by exercising the constitutional right of veto: as, to veto a bill.

vetoist (vē'tō-ist), n. [< veto + -ist]. One who exercises the right of veto; a vetoer.

Vetterlin gun. See gun.

Vetterlin repeating rifle. See rifle.

vettura (vet-tō'rā), n. [It., = F. voiture, < L. vectura, a carrying, carriage: see recture.] An Italian four-wheeled carriage.

vetturino (vet-tō-rē'nō), n.; pl. vetturini (-nī). [It., < vettura, a carriage: see vettura.] In Italy, one who lends for hire a vettura or carriage, or who drives such a vehicle.

veuglairet, n. [OF., < Flem. vogheleer, fowling-piece, < voghel, a bird: see fowl.] A small cannon, loaded by a movable chamber fitted into the breech, used in Europe in the sixteenth century: same as focher, 2. Also vogler.

venue (vēv), n. [F.] Any bird of the genus Vidua, in a broad sense, or of the subfamily Viduinæ; a whidah-bird. See Vidua.

vew (vū), n. [Also veer and veve (Halliwell).] The vew, Taxus baccata. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

vex (veks), v. [< F. vexer = Sp. Pg. vexar, < L. vexare, shake, jolt, hence distress, orig. shake in carrying, freq. of vehere, carry: see vehicle.]

I. trans. 1. To make angry by little provocations; excite slight anger or displeasure in; trouble by petty or light annoyances; irritate; tease; fret; plague; annoy; harass.

They that vex and inquiet themselves with cares and study. Sir T. More, Utopia, Ded. to Peter Giles, p. 11.

Such an injury would vex a very saint.

Shak., T. of the S., iii. 2. 28.

O, I shall burst if I cut not my lace, I'm so vexed! Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

There! you stumble on the stair, and are vexed at your own awkwardness. G. W. Curtis, Prue and I, p. 10.

2. To make sorrowful; grieve; afflict; distress.

As all endeavours use to seduce by pleasing, so all punishments endeavour by vexing to reform transgressions. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 72.

Yet sold they not his Coat; With this, said they, As Jacob vexed us, We'll vex Him again.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 135.

3. To agitate; disturb; overturn or throw into commotion; hence, to dispute; contest; cause to be discussed: in this sense chiefly used in the past participle: as, a vexed (much discussed but unsettled) question.

He was met even now

As mad as the vex'd sea. Shak., Lear, iv. 4. 2.

How are endless fields vexed with ploughshares!

Channing, Perfect Life, p. 157.

Not vexing a question (settled forever without our votes).

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xli.

No thought of storm the morning vexes yet.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 291.

= Syn. 1. Annoy, Plague, etc. (see tease), provoke, gall, chafe.—3. To disquiet.

II. † intrans. To fret; be teased or irritated; feel annoyed, angry, or distressed.

I do command thee be my slave forever,

And vex while I laugh at thee.

Fletcher (and another), False One, iv. 2.

Prithce, sweet Mistress Dorothy, vex not; how much is it [a debt]?

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

vex (veks), n. [< vex, v.] A trouble; a vexation. [Scotch.]

My mother gar'd me learn the Single Carritch, whilk was a great vex. Scott, Old Mortality, xxxvii.

A sair vex to mony a . . . body.

Geo. MacDonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, xliii.

vexation (vek-sā'shon), n. [< F. vexation = Sp. vejación = Pg. vexação = It. vessazione, < L. vexatio (n-), agitation, annoyance, < vexare, agitate, vex: see vex.] 1. The act of vexing, annoying, troubling, grieving, or distressing; specifically, a harassing under forms of law; a troubling, annoying, or vexing by legal process, as by a malicious suit.

Albeit the party grieved thereby may have some reason to complain of an untrue charge, yet may he not well call it an unjust vexation. Bacon.

No noise, no pulling, no vexation wakes thee,

Thy lethargy is such. B. Jonson, Catiline, iii. 2.

2. The state of being vexed, irritated, grieved, or distressed; irritation; sorrow; grief; annoyance.

All thy vexations

Were but my trials of thy love.

Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 5.

There's nothing of so infinite vexation

As man's own thoughts.

Webster, White Devil, v. 2.

One who fails in some simple mechanical action feels vexation at his own inability—a vexation arising quite apart from any importance of the end missed.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 517.

3. A cause of irritation, annoyance, distress, sorrow, or grief; affliction.

Your children were vexation to your youth.

Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 305.

= Syn. 2. Anger, Vexation, Indignation, etc. (see anger). Chagrin, etc. (see mortification); trouble, exasperation, chagrin, petulance.

vexatious (vek-sā'shus), a. [< vexati (on) + -ous.] 1. Causing vexation, annoyance, trouble, or the like; teasing; annoying; troublesome: as, a vexatious neighbor; a vexatious circumstance.

Did they convert a legal claim into a vexatious extortion?

Bucke, Rev. in France.

Continual vexatious wars.

South.

2. Full of trouble or disquiet.

He leads a vexatious life who in his noblest actions is so gored with scruples that he dares not make a step without the authority of another.

Sir K. Digby.

An administration all new and all vexatious was introduced.

R. Choate, Addresses, p. 54.

Vexatious suit, in law, a suit begun without probable cause, or, by reason of other pending proceedings, superfluous and serving only to vex or annoy. = Syn. 1. Irritating, provoking.

vexilla, n. Plural of vexillum.

vexillar (vek'si-lār), a. [= F. vexillaire = Pg. vexillario, < L. vexillarius, a standard-bearer, also one of the senior class of veterans, < vexillum, a standard: see vexillum.] 1. Pertaining to an ensign or standard.—2. In bot., same as vexillary, 2.—3. In ornith., of or pertaining to the vane, web, or vexillum of a feather.

vexillary (vek'si-lā-ri), a. and n. [< L. vexillarius, a standard-bearer: see vexillar.] 1. a. 1. Same as vexillar, 1.—2. In bot., of or pertaining to the vexillum or standard.—Vexillary estimation, a mode of estimation in which the exterior petal, as in the case of the vexillum, is largest, and incloses and folds over the other petals.

II. n. One who carries a vexillum; a standard-bearer.

Letters like to those the vexillary

Hath left crag-carven o'er the streaming Gelt.

Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

vexillate (vek'si-lāt), a. [< vexillum (um) + -ate]. Having vexilla or pogonia; webbed or pogoniate, as a feather.

vexillation (vek'si-lā'shon), n. [< L. vexillatio (n-), a body of soldiers under one standard, a battalion, < vexillum, a standard: see vexillum.] A company of troops under one vexillum or ensign.

vexillator (vek'si-lā-tor), n. [ML., < L. vexillum, a standard: see vexillum.] A standard-bearer. See the quotations.

In manner of representation there was no essential difference between the performance of a morality and that of a miracle; the pageants used for one were used for the other; vexillators proclaimed the intended performance, and the performers went from place to place, in both cases.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 58.

The prologue to this curious drama ["Corpus Christi"] is delivered by three persons, who speak alternately, and are called vexillators. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 229.

vexillum (vek-sil'um), n.; pl. vexilla (-ā). [L., a military ensign, a standard, banner, flag, also a company, < vehere, carry: see vex, vehicle.]

1. In Rom. antiq.: (a) Strictly, the standard of a maniple; hence, any military standard, whatever its character, except the eagle of the legion. (b) The troops collected under a vexillum; a company; a troop; any body of soldiers serving under an ensign separate from that of the legion; hence, under the empire, the body of veteran soldiers connected with a legion who, having served sixteen years in the legion, were detached under a vexillum of their own, with special privileges, for their remaining four years of service. These vexilla averaged from 500 to 600 in strength.—2. Eccles.: (a) A processional banner; also, a processional cross. (b) A kind of flag or pennon attached by a cord to the upper part of a bishop's pastoral staff. It is folded round the staff, to prevent the metal of which the staff is made, or with which it is mounted, from being tarnished by the moisture of the hand. Also orarium, sudarium, veil.

3. In her., same as banderole, 1 (b).—4. In bot., the standard, or large posterior petal, of a papilionaceous flower. It is external, and wrapped around the others in the bud. Also vexil. See cut under papilionaceous.—5. In ornith., a pogonium, web, or vane of a feather; also, both webs together with the rachis upon which they are borne. Also called standard.

vexingly (vek'sing-li), adv. In a vexing manner; so as to vex, tease, or irritate.

vexingness (vek'sing-nes), n. The character or state of being vexing.

So stirring and vibrant with commerce and speculation.
The Century, XXVI, 828.

2. Of sounds, resonant; sonorous; characterized by a perceptible vibration; sometimes, tremulous.

Gaily the old man sang to the vibrant sound of his fiddle.
Longfellow, Evangeline, i. 4.

Her eyes were brilliant, her glance was tender, . . . her voice was vibrant with feeling.

C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, p. 8.

vibrate (vī'brat), v.: pret. and pp. vibrated, ppr. vibrating. [< L. vibratus, pp. of vibrare (> It. vibrare = Sp. Pg. vibrar = F. vibrer), set in tremulous motion, move to and fro, brandish, shake; cf. Skt. √ vip, tremble.] I. intrans.
 1. To swing; oscillate; move one way and the other; play to and fro, as the pendulum.

The government would vibrate between the two factions (for such will parties have become) at each successive election.
Calhoun, Works, I. 42.

2. To move in any kind of stationary motion under forces of restitution, commonly with a rapid motion.—3. To produce a vibratory or resonant effect; thrill; quiver: as, a whisper vibrates on the ear.

Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory. Shelley, To —.

Stephen had the fibre of nobleness in him that vibrated to her appeal.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 11.

4. To fluctuate or waver, as between two opinions.

II. trans. 1. To cause to move or wave to and fro; cause to swing or oscillate; hence, to throw with a vibratory motion; hurl.

That orator [Pericles] of whom (amongst so many that vibrated thunderbolts) it was said peculiarly that he thundered and thundered.
De Quincy, Style, iii.

2. To affect with vibratory motion; cause to quiver: as, vibrated breath.—3. To measure or indicate by vibrating or oscillating: as, a pendulum vibrating seconds.

vibratile (vī'brā-tīl), a. [= F. vibratile; as vibrate + -ile.] Capable of vibrating; susceptible of being vibrated; vibratory: as, a vibratile organ; vibratile action or motion.—Vibratile antennæ, in entom., antennæ which are slender and constantly quivering or vibrating as the insect moves, as in the Ichnumonidae and some other Hymenoptera.—Vibratile cell, a ciliated cell.—Vibratile epithelium, epithelium composed of ciliated cells.—Vibratile membrane. See membrane.

vibratilitv (vī-brā-tīl'ī-tī), n. [< vibratile + -ity.] The property or state of being vibratile; disposition to vibration or oscillation.

vibration (vī-brā'shon), n. [< F. vibration = Sp. vibración = Pg. vibração = It. vibrazione, < L. vibratio (n.), a shaking or brandishing. < vibrare, shake, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. The act of vibrating; a movement to and fro; oscillation; hence, fluctuation in general: as, a vibration of opinion.

The late proceedings seem to be producing a decisive vibration in our favor.

Jefferson, To James Madison, Correspondence, I. 300.
 Like the great cords of a harp, in loud and solemn vibrations.
Longfellow, Evangeline, ii. 4.

In Virginia there had been a great vibration of opinion.
Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 354.

2. In physics, an oscillating, reciprocating, or any kind of stationary motion made by a body, as a pendulum, musical cord, elastic plate, or mass of air, when forced from the position, figure, or volume of equilibrium, under the influence of forces of restitution. When the reciprocating movement is comparatively slow, as that of a pendulum, which is produced by the action of gravity on the whole mass of the body, the term oscillation is commonly used, while the term vibration is generally confined to a motion with rapid reciprocations or revolutions, as that of a sonorous body, which proceeds from the attractions (with perhaps some repulsions) of the molecules of the body on each other when a disturbance takes place in their state of equilibrium. In the case of a vibrating string or rod, the vibrations are distinguished as transverse or longitudinal, according to the direction of the oscillating movement relatively to the length of the sonorous body. The term vibration is also applied to the motion (generally an elliptical revolution) which is produced among the particles of a fluid or ethereal medium when their equilibrium is disturbed by any impulse, by which means waves or undulations are caused. In all cases one complete vibration means the double movement of the particle or vibrating body to and fro about the position of equilibrium, while the movement forward and backward on one side only is a half-vibration. The laws of vibratory motion form the foundation of the theories devised by modern science to account for the phenomena of acoustics and optics. See sound, and undulatory theory of light (under light), 1, also cuts under nodal and sonometer.

The phenomena of polarisation demonstrated . . . that the vibrations of light take place at right angles to the direction of the rays.
Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 351.

3. In med., same as frematus.—4. In nat. hist., movement to and fro, especially when quick, continuous, regular, and of little amplitude; a quivering or shivering motion; tremulousness; tremor: as, the vibration of aspen-leaves on the breeze; the vibration of the ear-drum under sound-waves; the vibration of a fly's wings in flight. The word is also somewhat specifically applied to ciliary action, or the motion of microscopic bodies, as cilia, flagella, vibracula, vibrios, spermatic filaments, and the like, vibration being the most obvious activity of such objects, and a usual means of locomotion, of ingestion of food, etc.—

Amplitude of a simple vibration. See amplitude.—Amplitude of vibration, the maximum excursion or displacement of a vibrating body or particle from a position of rest.—Free vibration, a vibration whose period depends only upon the nature and form of the vibrating body: used in contradistinction to forced vibration, when the period is more or less modified by some outside influence, as the vibrations of a neighboring body of slightly different pitch.—Funipendulous vibration. See funipendulous.—Harmonic vibration. Same as simple harmonic motion (which see, under harmonic).—Lateral vibration. See lateral.—Period of vibration, the shortest time between instants at which the displacement and velocity of the vibrating body are the same both in amount and in direction.—Phase of vibrations, the time elapsed at an assumed zero of time since the passage of the vibrating body through equilibrium divided by the complete period of vibration, this quotient being multiplied by 360°.

vibrational (vī-brā'shon-əl), a. [< vibration + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of vibration.

The vibrational impulse may be given as nearly as possible at the centre of the mass of air in the resonant box.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 242, note 1.

vibratiuncle (vī-brā'ti-ung-kul), n. [*< NL. *vibratiuncula*, dim. of L. vibratio (n.), vibration: see vibration.] A small vibration. Also vibratiuncle. See the quotation under vestigium.

The brain, not the spinal marrow or nerves, is the seat of the soul, as far as it presides over the voluntary motions. For the efficacy of the motory vibratiuncles depends chiefly on that part of them which is excited within the brain.
Hartley, Theory of the Human Mind, i. § 3.

Hartley supposes that the vibrations excited by a sensory or other impression do not die away, but are represented by smaller vibrations, or vibratiuncles, the permanency and intensity of which are in relation with the frequency of repetition of the primary vibrations.
Huxley, Animal Automatism.

vibratiunculation (vī-brā'ti-ung-kū-lā'shon), n. [*< NL. *vibratiuncula* + -ation.] A little thrill, throb, or throe; a slight shudder; a vibratiuncle. Coues, Dæmon of Darwin (1885), p. 58. [Rare.]

vibrative (vī-brā-tiv), a. [< vibrate + -ive.] Vibrating; vibratory; causing vibration.

A vibrative motion. Newton.

vibrato (vī-brā'tō), n. [It., pp. of vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] A pulsating effect in vocal music produced by the rapid reiteration of emphasis on a tone, as if under the impulse of great emotion. Strictly, the vibrato is distinct from the tremolo, in that the latter involves a perceptible variation in pitch; but in common usage the terms are made synonymous.

vibrator (vī-brā'tor), n. [< NL. vibrator, < L. vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. In elect. or teleg., a reed the vibrations of which are made to open and close the electric circuit and hence transmit pulsatory currents; also, a reed acted on by pulsatory currents by means of an electromagnet, and hence made to respond to the vibrations of a corresponding reed sending these currents from a distance. See harmonic telegraph, under telegraph.—2. In the reed-organ, one of the reeds by which the tone is produced.—3. In printing, an inking-roller that has a vibrating as well as a rotary movement, which aids the distribution of ink on the inking-table of a cylinder-press.

vibratory (vī-brā'tō-ri), a. [= F. vibratoire = Sp. Pg. vibratorio; as vibrate + -ory.] 1. Vibrating; consisting in or belonging to vibration or oscillation; vibrative.

Vibratory motion of solids, which is really a molecular disturbance, is absorbed by being transformed into other kinds of molecular motion, and so may finally be transferred to the ether.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 246.

2. Causing vibration.

The smoothness of the oil, and the vibratory power of the salt, cause the sense we call sweetness.
Burke, Sublime and Beautiful.

Vibrio (vib'ri-ō), n. [NL. (Cohn), < L. vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. A genus or form-genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, by some authorities regarded as the same as Spirillum. They have cylindrical, curved, or spirally wound rigid cells, provided at each end with a cilium. They occur in infusions, on teeth, in sea-water, etc. (See Spirillum, Schizomycetes). The genus is a very old one, having been characterized by O. F. Muller in 1756 as "elongate infusorians without external organs," and has included at times various minute animals which have nothing to do with it. See def. 3.

2. [l. c.; pl. vibrios or vibriones (vib'ri-ōz, vib'ri-ō'nez).] A member of this genus; a vibrio; a motile bacterium.—3t. [l. c.] An animalcule like or mistaken for a bacterium, and misplaced in the genus Vibrio: an old name of some minute nematoids, as those species of Tylenchus which infest wheat and cause ear-cockles.

vibrio (vib'ri-on), n.; pl. vibriones (vib'ri-ō'nēz). [< F. vibron, < NL. vibrion (n.); see Vibrio.] One of the microscopic motile filaments which may be developed in organic infusions; a vibrio; a motile bacterium. See Vibrio, 1.

Vibrionidæ (vib'ri-on'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vibrio (n.) + -idæ.] A family of microscopic organisms, named from the genus Vibrio, and including some minute nematoid worms which were confounded with certain microbes. See Vibrio, 3. Also called Vibrionia and Vibrionina, and referred to the Infusoria, as by Ehrenberg and by Dujardin.

vibrionine (vib'ri-ō-nin), a. [< vibron + -ine.] Pertaining to or resembling vibrios.

vibrissa (vī-bris'sā), n.; pl. vibrissæ (-ē). [NL., < L. vibrissa, usually in pl. vibrissæ, the hairs in the nostrils.] 1. In mammal., one of the long, stiff bristles which grow upon the upper lip and elsewhere upon the head of most mammals; a whisker, as of a cat. They are tactile organs, or feelers, and are sometimes called tactile hairs (pili tactiles). There is a popular notion that the whiskers reach out just far enough on each side to enable the animal to judge whether a hole or other close passage is large enough for it to pass through, and very probably this is true in many cases. See cuts under mouse, ocelot, panther, seraal, tiger, and tiger-cat.

2. In ornith., a rictal bristle; one of the special set of long, slender, bristle-like or bristly feathers, devoid of vixilla proper, which grow in a series along each side of the rictus or gape of the mouth of many birds, as flycatchers, goatsuckers, and others. When very long, as in the goatsucker, they are sometimes called vibrissæ pectinate, and may have lateral filaments, as in the chuck-will's-widow. The use of the vibrissæ is supposed to be to entangle the legs and wings of insects, and thus diminish or prevent their struggling when caught, as the bristles are observed to be especially well developed in insectivorous birds which take their prey on the wing. See cuts under Platyrhynchus, flycatcher, goatsucker, and whippoorwill.

3. In human anat., one of the hairs which grow in the nostrils.—4. In entom., one of the projecting lateral bristles on the upper border of the peristomium or mouth-cavity of certain Diptera.

vibroscope (vī-brō-skōp), n. [< L. vibrare, vibrate, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for observing, or for registering, vibrations.

Viburnum (vī-bér'num), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. viburnum, the wayfaring-tree.] 1. A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Caprifoliaceæ and tribe Sambuceæ. It resembles the related genus Sambucus, the elder, in its corymbose or thyrsoid inflorescence, but is distinguished by the absence of any pinnately parted leaves. There are about 80 species, natives of the northern hemisphere and of the Andes, with a few species elsewhere in the southern hemisphere and in Madagascar. They are shrubs or small trees, usually with opposite branchlets and large naked buds. The leaves are petioled and opposite, or rarely whorled in threes; they are entire, serrate or dentate, rarely lobed. The white or pinkish corymbs of flowers are somewhat umbelled or paniced, and are axillary or terminal; the flowers are usually wheel-shaped, with five equal lobes, and a one- to three-celled ovary becoming in fruit a dry or fleshy ovoid or globose drupe usually one-celled and containing a single compressed and deeply furrowed seed. The fruit is edible but insipid in V. Lentago, acid in V. Opulus, astringent in others, in which it is said, however, to be edible after fermentation, and to have been made into cakes by the North American Indians. In several species, forming the section Opulus (also peculiar in its scaly buds), the marginal flowers, of a broad flat inflorescence, are enlarged and sterile. (See cuts under hobble-bush and neutral, and compare guelder rose and snowball.) In the five other sections the flowers are all alike, and the winter buds, unlike most plants of temperate regions, are without scales. In a few Himalayan and Chinese species (the section Solenotinus) the flowers are tubular, elongated, and paniced, and in a few others funnelliform. Three species occur in Europe, Flowering Branch of Arrow wood Viburnum dentatum. a, flowers; b, fruits.

7. [cap.] The stock buffoon in the old English moralities, or moral plays, sometimes having the name of one specific vice, as Fraud, Envy, Covetousness, sometimes of Vice in general. See Iniquity, 4.

Like to the old Vice, . . .
Who, with dagger of lath,
In his rage and his wrath
Cries, ah, ha! to the devil.
Shak., T. N., iv. 2, 134.

Now issued in from the rearward madam Vice, or old Iniquity, with a lath dagger painted, according to the fashion of old Vice in a comedy.

Old's Almanack (1618), p. 12. (Nares.)

When every great man had his Vice stand by him
In his long coat, shaking his wooden dagger.
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 1.

—Syn. 3 and 4 Iniquity, etc. See crime.

vice<sup>2</sup>, n. and v. See visi 1.

vice<sup>3</sup> (vis), n. [< vice, prefix, in the words concerned.] A vice-chairman, vice-president, or other substitute or deputy, the principal or primary officer being indicated by the context.

The governor . . . was a more imposing personage than his Vice, and was robed in character with his greater pretensions.
R. Tames, Americans in Japan, p. 157.

The company . . . within a quarter of an hour were all seated in the great room of the Blue Lion Inn, Muggleton—Mr. Dumkins acting as chairman, and Mr. Luffey officiating as vice.
Dickens, Pickwick, vii.

vice<sup>4</sup> (vi'se), prep. [< L. vice, in the place (of), instead (of) (followed by a genitive), abl. of vis, gen. visis, etc., change, alternation, akin to Gr. visar, yield, AS. wican, etc., yield: see weak, wick, wicker.] In the place of; instead of: a Latin noun used in a position which gives it, as transferred to English, the effect of a preposition governing the following noun: as, Lieutenant A is gazetted as captain, vice Captain B promoted.

vice (vis). [< vice<sup>4</sup>. Hence vice<sup>3</sup>. This prefix appears as vis, formerly also vi, in viscount.] A prefix denoting, in the word compounded with it, one who acts in place of another, or one who is second in rank: as, vice-president, vice-chancellor. It is sometimes used alone as a noun, the word for which it stands being indicated by the context. Vice in some cases indicates a deputy appointed by the principal officer or authority, and receiving his power by delegation, as in the case of a viceroy or vicegerent; and in other cases it indicates an alternative officer, alternate, or substitute appointed or elected by the same power as the primary officer, and receiving his power not by delegation, but directly in the same manner as the primary officer, and having no power to act in place of the primary officer except in case of a vacancy or, it may be, absence or disability, in which case he acts not under the direction of the primary officer, but independently as a substitute. This is the nature of the office of vice-president or vice-chairman.

vice-admiral (vis-ad'mi-ral), n. A degree of the rank of admiral. See admiral, 2.

The vice-admiral in the middle of the fleet, with a great squadron of gallees, struck sail directly.
Knolles, Hist. Turks.

vice-admiralty (vis-ad'mi-ral-ti), n. The office of a vice-admiral; a vice-admiralty court. —Vice-admiralty courts, tribunals established in British possessions beyond the seas, with jurisdiction over maritime causes, including those relating to prize.

vice-agent (vis-ā-jent), n. One who acts for another; especially, a subordinate agent; the agent of an agent.

She cannot content the Lord with performance of his discipline that hath at her side a vassal whom Satan hath made his vice-agent to cross whatsoever the faithful should do. Tertullian, quoted in Hooker's Eccles. Polity, v. 41.

vice-bitten (vis-bit'n), a. Corrupted with vice; given over to evil courses.

A man vice-bitten.

Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 181. (Davies.)

vice-chairman (vis-chār'man), n. An alternate chairman. See vice.

vice-chairmanship (vis-chār'man-ship), n. [< vice-chairman + -ship.] The office or duties of a vice-chairman.

vice-chamberlain (vis-chām'bér-lān), n. The deputy of a chamberlain; in the royal household of England, the deputy of the lord chamberlain.

The chamberlains [at Worcester] are annually elected, at the same time as the mayor and aldermen. . . . Their business, which is performed by a deputy called a vice-chamberlain, is to receive the rents and keep all the accounts of the corporation.
Municip. Corp. Reports, 1835, p. 154.

vice-chancellor (vis-chān'sel-or), n. The deputy or substitute of a chancellor. Specifically—(a) One of three judges in the chancery division of the High Court of Justice in England, holding a separate court, whose decisions are subject to appeal to the lords justices of appeal and to the House of Lords, of which the lord chancellor is head. There is, besides, a vice-chancellor of the Court of Chancery in Ireland; the judge of the local Court of Chancery of the Duchy of Lancaster is also styled vice-chancellor. (b) An officer of a university who in the older institutions is generally empowered to discharge the duties of the chancellor, and is in fact the administrative officer.

I . . . carried out the whole Act in St. Marie's, the long speeches of the Proctors, the Vice-Chancellor, the several Professors.
Evelyn, Diary, July 10, 1654.

I have received your Letter, with the enclosed from the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of your famous University, myself an unfit object in such manner to be saluted by such reverend persons.

Thomas Adams, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 147.

(c) In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the cardinal at the head of the department of the Roman chancery which drafts and expedites the bulls and briefs by which the mind of the Pope is made known to Christendom, or to particular suitors. Rom. Cath. Dict., p. 241.—Assessor of the vice-chancellor. See assessor.

vice-chancellorship (vis-chān'sel-or-ship), n. [< vice-chancellor + -ship.] The office or dignity of a vice-chancellor.

They have great expectations from your Vice-Chancellorship [at Oxford], which I hope is not far off.

E. Gibson, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 235.

He [the German chancellor] is thus, in effect, ultimately responsible in every case—even for the non-exercise of his office. The vice-chancellorship is only a convenience.
W. Wilson, State, § 426.

vicecomes (vi'sē-kō'mēz), n.; pl. vicecomites (-kom'i-tēz). [ML.: see viscount.] A viscount or sheriff.

These Portgraves are also in divers Records called Vicecomites, Vicounties, or Sheriffs, as being under an Earle; for that they then, as since, used that office as the Sheriffs of London do till this day.

Stow, Survey of London (ed. 1633), p. 536.

Even before his recognition as mayor, his signature, when he signs a document, comes first on the roll after that of the vicecomes.

Quoted in The Academy, March 14, 1891, p. 260.

vice-constable (vis-kun'stā-bl), n. A deputy constable.

Sir Ralph Ashton was accordingly appointed Vice-Constable hac vice, to exercise all the powers of the Lord High Constable for the particular emergency.

J. Gairdner, Richard III., iv.

vice-consul (vis-kon'sul), n. One who acts in the place of a consul; a subordinate officer to whom special consular functions are delegated in a district already under the general supervision of a consul, or to whom consular functions are assigned in a district not of sufficient importance to require the presence of a consul.

The Europeans have their vice-consuls and factors here to transact their business, and letters are brought regularly from Alexandria by land, to be sent by boats to Cairo.

Pococke, Description of the East, I. 14.

vice-consulship (vis-kon'sul-ship), n. [< vice-consul + -ship.] The office or duties of a vice-consul.

The vice-consulship was soon after filled.

E. H. Yates, Fifty Years of London Life.

vice-dean (vis-dēn'), n. 1. In British cathedrals, a canon annually chosen to represent the dean in his absence. — 2. A subdean.

vicegerency (vis-jē'ren-si), n. [< vicegeren(t) + -cy.] The office of a vicegerent; deputed power.

To the great vicegerency I grew,
Being a title as supreme as new.

Drayton, Legend of Thomas Cromwell, st. 64.

Vicegerency and deputation under God. South.

Pope poisoned pope, contending for God's vicegerency.

Landor, Imag. Conv., Archdeacon Hare and Landor.

Is yonder squalid peasant all
That this proud nursery could breed
For God's vicegerency and stead?

Emerson, Monadnoc.

vicegerent (vis-jē'rent), a. and n. [< OF. vicegerent, F. vicegerent, < ML. vicegeren(t)s, vicegerent; as vice- + gerent.] 1. a. Having or exercising delegated power; acting in the place of another, as by substitution or deputation.

Under his great vicegerent reign abide United, as one individual soul.

Milton, P. L., v. 609.

II. n. An officer deputed by a superior or by proper authority to exercise the powers of the higher authority; one having a delegated power; a deputy; a vicar.

All Protestants hold that Christ in his Church hath left no Vicegerent of his Power; but himself without Deputy is the only Head thereof, governing it from Heaven.

Milton, Free Commonwealth.

Distant nations looked on the Pope as the vicegerent of the Almighty, the oracle of the All-wise.

Macaulay, Machiavelli.

The temporal sword came too often into collision with the spiritual—the divine vicegerent at Westminster with the divine vicegerent at Rome. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 461.

vice-governor (vis-guv'er-nor), n. A deputy governor; a lieutenant-governor.

The vice-governor of the islands was invited on one occasion to dine on board the "Marchesa."

Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 322.

vice-king (vis-king'), n. One who acts in the place of a king; a viceroy.

I shall most sojourn in Normandy;
And thou be my vice-king in England.

Tennyson, Harold, ii. 2.

About that time, Tamasese, the vice-king, became prominent as a rebel.
The Century, XXXVIII. 24.

vice-legate (vis-leg'āt), n. A subordinate or deputy legate. Small tt.

viceman, n. See viseman.

vicenary (vis'e-nā-ri), a. [< L. vicenarius, of or pertaining to the number twenty, < viceni, rarely vigini, twenty each, distributive of viginti, twenty: see twenty.] Belonging to or consisting of twenty.

vicennial (vis-en'i-āl), a. [Cf. F. vicennial = Sp. vicinal = Pg. vicinal = It. vicennale, < LL. vicennalis, of twenty years, < L. vicennium, a period of twenty years, < vicies, twenty times (< viginti, twenty), + annus, year.] 1. Lasting or continuing twenty years: as, a vicennial charter or license. — 2. Happening once in twenty years: as, a vicennial commemoration. — Vicennial prescription, in Scots law, a prescription of twenty years: one of the lesser prescriptions, pleadable against holograph bonds not attested by witnesses.

vice-presidency (vis-prez'i-den-si), n. [< vice-president(t) + -cy.] The office or term of vice-president.

Each party holds during that summer a great convention composed of party delegates from all parts of the Union, and nominates the candidates of its choice for the presidency and vice-presidency.

W. Wilson, The State, § 1099.

vice-president (vis-prez'i-ident), n. An officer who is selected in advance to fill the presidential office in case of the death, disability, or absence of the president. The Vice-President of the United States is chosen by the electors at the same time with the President; on the resignation, removal, death, or disability of the latter he succeeds to the office of President. He is, unless he has succeeded to the Presidency as above, the presiding officer of the Senate.

vice-presidentship (vis-prez'i-ident-ship), n. [< vice-president + -ship.] The office of vice-president; vice-presidency.

The vice-presidentship being a sinecure, a second-rate man agreeable to the wire-pullers is always smuggled in. The chance of succession to the presidency is too distant to be thought of.
Bagehot, Eng. Const., p. 76.

vice-principal (vis-prin'si-pāl), n. A deputy or assistant principal: as, the vice-principal of an academy.

vice-queen (vis-kwēn'), n. A woman who rules as the substitute or deputy of a king or of a queen; a viceroy's wife. See vice-king. [Rare.]

[It was] their [the Marquis and Marchioness of Lorne's] common wish that they should proceed to India as Viceroy and Vicequeen; . . . but there were political objections to the step.
T. H. S. Escott, Society in London, I. 11.

vice-rector (vis-rek'tor), n. [ML. vicerektor; as vice- + rector.] A deputy or assistant rector.

Wesel was one of the professors at Erfurt between 1445 and 1456, and was vice-rector in 1458.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 503.

viceregal (vis-rē'gal), a. Of or relating to a viceroy or viceroyalty: as, viceregal power.

In Manitoba there are separate Roman Catholic schools, and these might be protected under the same statute [British North America Act] by the Viceregal veto.
Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, i. 2.

vice-regent (vis-rē'jent), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to, or occupying the position of, a vice-regent.

The [German] Emperor's own will or that of the vice-regent Chancellor is the real centre and source of all policy; the heads of department are ministers of that will.

W. Wilson, The State, § 1149.

II. n. A deputy regent; one who acts in the place of a ruler, governor, or sovereign.

The five Ephors (or Overseers, for such is the meaning of the title) were originally mere deputies of the kings, appointed to assist them in the performance of their judicial duties, to act as vice-regents in the absence of their royal principals: . . . in short, to serve in all things as the assistants of the kings.

W. Wilson, The State, § 104.

viceroy (vis'roi), n. [< OF. viceroy, F. viceroy = Pg. vicerei = It. vicere, < ML. vicere, viceroy; as vice- + roy.] 1. A vice-king; the governor of a kingdom or colony, who rules in the name of the king (or queen), as the deputy of the sovereign: as, the viceroy of India or of Ireland.

This Cittle [Caer, Cairo] standeth in the land of Egypt, and is vnder the government of the great Turke. And there is a king ouer the saide Cittle, who is called the king of the great Caer, and ye Wise Roy or Lieutenant to the great Turke.
E. Webbe, Travels (ed. Arber), p. 21.

We are so far from having a king that even the viceroy is generally absent four fifths of his time.

Swift.

When vicious passions and impulses are very strong, it is idle to tell the sufferer that he would be more happy if his nature were radically different from what it is.

4. Impure; foul; vitiated; as, vicious humors.
—5. Faulty; incorrect; not pure; corrupt; as, a vicious style.

Whatever transgressed those limits, they counted it for ritious; and thereupon did set down a manner of regiment in all speech generally to be observed, consisting in six points.

It is a vicious use of speech to take out a substantive kernel from its content and call that its object.

6. Not well broken or trained; given to objectionable tricks: said of an animal.

He was, in fact, noted for preferring vicious animals, given to all kinds of tricks, which kept the rider in constant risk of his neck.

7. Characterized by severity; virulent; malignant; spiteful; as, a vicious attack. [Colloq.]

Vicious circle. See circle. Vicious intramission.
See intramission. 3.—Vicious syllogism, a fallacy or sophism.—Vicious union, the knitting of the two fragments of a broken bone in such a way as to cause deformation of the limb or marked interference with its function.

viciously (vish'us-li), adv. In a vicious manner. Specifically—(a) In a manner contrary to rectitude, virtue, or purity; as, a viciously inclined person. (b) Faultily; incorrectly; as, a picture viciously painted.

viciousness (vish'us-nes), n. The quality or state of being vicious. (a) The quality or state of being imperfect; faultiness; imperfection; defectiveness;
as, the viciousness of a system or method. (b) Corruptness of moral principles or practice; habitual violation of the moral law or disregard of moral duties; depravity in principles or in manners.

When we in our viciousness grow hard.
Shak., A. and C. iii. 13. 111.

The best and most excellent of the old law-givers and philosophers among the Greeks had an allay of viciousness.

(c) Unruliness; trickiness; bad training, as of a shying or bolting horse.

A broken-down plough-horse, that had outlived almost everything but his viciousness.

(d) Spitefulness; malignancy.

vicissitude (vi-sis'i-tūd), n. [= F. vicissitude = Sp. vicisitud = Pg. vicissitude, < L. vicissitudo, change, < vicissim, by turns, < **vix* (vie-), change: see vix.] 1. Regular change or succession of one thing to another; alternation.

God created them equal, but by this it came to passe that the vicissitude or intercourse of day and night was uncertain.

Grateful vicissitude, like day and night.
Milton, P. L., vi. 8.

2. A passing from one state or condition to another; irregular change; revolution; mutation: as, the vicissitudes of fortune.

But it is not good to look too long upon these turning wheels of vicissitude, lest we become giddy.

mours, there must be Vices, and vicissitudes of Things.

Sometimes 'tis grateful to the rich to try
A short vicissitude, and fit of poverty.

But vicissitudes so extraordinary as those which marked the reign of Charles the Second can only be explained by supposing an utter want of principle in the political world.

The whirlpool of political vicissitude, which makes the tenure of office generally so fragile.

vicissitudinarity (vi-sis-i-tū'di-nā-ri), a. [ < L.

vicintiel (vi-kon'ti-el), a. [Also vicintiel: < (OF. (AF.)) vicintiel, < vicente, sheriff, viscount: see viscount.] In old Eng. law, pertaining to the sheriff or viscount. Vicintiel rents, certain farm-rents paid by the sheriff to the king. By 3 and 4 William IV., c. 39, such farms were placed under the management of the commissioners of the woods and forests. Vicintiel writs, writs triable in the county or sheriff court.

vicount, n. A former spelling of viscount.

vicountiell, a. See vicintiel.

victim (vik'tim), n. [< F. victima = Sp. victima = Pg. victima = It. vittima, < L. victima, a beast for sacrifice, prob. so called as being adorned with a fillet or band, < vincire (√ vinc, vinc), bind, bind around, wind: see vinculum. (f. vicia, vetch, prob. from the same root, also prob. vitta, a band, fillet, usually derived (as victima is also by some derived) from vincere, pp. vincens, bend or twist together, plait, weave, a root prob. ult. connected with that above mentioned.)] 1. A living being sacrificed to a deity, or in the performance of a religious rite; usually, some beast slain in sacrifice: but the sacrifice of human beings has been practised by many peoples with the object of appeasing the wrath or conciliating the favor of some deity, or in the ceremonies connected with the making of vows and covenants.

When the dull ox [shall know] why . . . he . . .

Is now a victim and now Egypt's God.

Pope, Essay on Man, l. 64.

Swift was the course: no vulgar prize they play;

No vulgar victim must reward the day

(Such as in races crown the speedy strife);

The prize contended was great Hector's life.

Pope, Iliad, xxii. 208.

2. A person sacrificed; a person killed or ruined, or greatly injured, or made to suffer in the pursuit of an object, or for the gratification of a passion or infatuation, or from disease or disaster: as, many have fallen victims to jealousy, to ambition; a victim to rheumatism; the victims of a railroad accident.

He had seen the lovely learned Lady Frances Bellamy, and had fallen a victim to her beauty and blueism.

T. Hook, Man of Many Friends, p. 4.

The planters [of Jamaica] had been ruined in consequence of the abolition of the slave trade in 1834, and their case was allowed to present certain features of injustice of which they were the victims.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, IV. 225.

Across the extensive acreage allotted to the victims of the sad cholera years the Prince of Zanzibar has ruthlessly cut his way to form a garden . . .

H. M. Stanley, Through the Dark Continent, I. 45.

3. One who is cheated or duped; a dupe; a gull: as, the victim of a confidence man.

He went off to the coach without further ceremony, and left his respected victim to settle the bill.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xx.

Women are, indeed, the easy victims both of priestcraft and self-delusion.

Marg. Fuller, Woman in 19th Century, p. 105.

victimater (vik'tim-ät), v. t. [< LL. victimatus, pp. of victimare (> F. victimar), sacrifice as a victim, < L. victima, a victim: see victim.] To sacrifice; immolate; victimize. Bullockar.

victimization (vik'tim-i-zä'shon), n. [< victimize + -ation.] The act of victimizing, or the state of being victimized. Also spelled victimisation.

The general victimization of good people by bad, which is the leading "motif" of the story.

Contemporary Rev., L. 365.

victimize (vik'tim-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. victimised, ppr. victimizing. [< victim + -ize.] To make a victim of; especially, to make the victim of a swindling transaction; dupe; cheat. Also spelled victimise. [Colloq.]

Mrs. Boldero's noble nephew, the present Strongitharm, . . . was victimized by his own uncle, and a most painful affair occurred between them at a game at "blind hockey."

Thackeray, Philip, xxi.

A fascinating married man, victimized by a crazy wife, and ready to throw himself on the sympathies of womanhood in this affliction.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 512.

By submitting in turn to be victimized, a party of children can secure, at a moderate cost to each, the zest of the malevolent feeling; and this I take to be the quintessence of play.

A. Bain, Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 311.

victimizer (vik'tim-i-zér), n. [< victimize + -er.] One who victimizes; a swindler. Also spelled victimiser.

The inviol had a great hatred and secret terror of her victimizer.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xix.

victor (vik'tor), n. and a. [= Sp. Pg. victor, vitor = It. vittore, < L. victor, a conqueror, < vincere, pp. vincens, conquer. From the same L. verb are also ult. victory, victorious, etc., convict, evict, convince, erince, vincible, invincible, vanquish, etc.] I. n. 1. One who wins in a contest of any kind; one who vanquishes another in any struggle, especially in war; one who defeats an enemy in battle; a conqueror.

Pericles was a famous man of warre,

And victor eke, in nine great foughten fields.

Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 64.

If your father had been victor there.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 134.

In love, the victors from the vanquish'd fly;

They fly that wound, and they pursue that die.

Waller, To a Friend, on the Different Success of [their Loves.

2. One who ruins or destroys; a destroyer. [Rare or poetical.]

There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,

And fame, this lord of useless thousands ends.

Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 313.

= Syn. 1. Victor, Conqueror. A victor differs from a conqueror inasmuch as the latter achieves a complete success and conquers his opponent perhaps after a series of victories, while the victor is so called because of his success in a single or a particular contest, which may be otherwise barren of result to him. Victor is also applied to one who gains the day in a personal contest or competition, as in a race.

II. a. Victorious.

Despite thy victor sword and fire-new fortune,

Thy valour and thy heart, thou art a traitor.

Shak., Lear, v. 3. 132.

Where's now their victor vaward wing,

Where Huntly, and where Home?

Scott, Marmion, vi. 33.

victor (vik'tor), v. i. [< victor, n.] To play the victor; exult.

To runne through all the pamphlets and the toyes

Which I haue seene in hands of Victoring Boyes.

A. Holland (Davies, Scourge of Folly, p. 80). (Davies.)

victorer (vik'tor-ér), n. [Early mod. E. victourer; < victor + -er.] One who gains victories; a victor. [Rare.]

The Spaniards as the mynisters of grace and libertie brought vnto these newe gentyles the victorie of Chrystes death, whereby they . . . are nowe made free from the bondage of Sathans tyrannie, by the myghty poure of this triumphant victourer.

R. Eden (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 50).

victoress (vik'tor-es), n. [< victor + -ess.] A female who is victorious; a victress.

Victoria (vik-tō-ri-ä), n. [< L. victoria: see victory.] 1. The twelfth planetoid, discovered by Hind in London in 1850.—2. [NL. (Lindley, 1838), named after Queen Victoria of England, to whom the first flower which blossomed in cultivation was presented in 1849.] A genus of water-lilies, belonging to the order Nymphaeaceæ and tribe Nymphaeæ. It is characterized by an inferior ovary, upon which all the parts of the flower are inserted, and by sterile inner stamens. The only species, V. regia, is known as the Victoria or royal water-lily, in Victoria Water-lily. Victoria regia.

Guiana (from the leaves) as irupe or water-platter, and sometimes as water-mat, from the use of the roasted seeds. The plant is an inhabitant of still waters from Paraguay to Venezuela, growing chiefly in secondary tributaries of the Amazon system. It produces a thick rootstock from which radiate long-petioled circular leaves, each about 6 feet across (sometimes 12), with an upturned rim about 3 inches high. Each leaf resembles a shallow circular floating tray, and is conspicuously marked with a network of depressed veins, between which the surface is swollen into slight quadrangular elevations resembling alligator-skin, which gradually disappear with age. The leaves are deep-green above, the under surface pink, and are set with strong, sharp, conical spines, which also clothe the petioles, peduncles, and ovary. The leaves are very strong; a single one has borne the weight of two men. A plant may produce as many as twelve leaves at once, filling a tank 20 to 40 feet across. The solitary floating flower is from 12 to 14 inches in diameter (sometimes 24), expanding at night white and fragrant, closing by day, and expanding for the last time the second evening. In one variety it is rose-color at the second expansion, but with the odor unpleasant, and partially expands a third time, then still deeper red, afterward withdrawing beneath the surface; in a third variety there is a sharp and beautiful contrast between outer white and central deep-rose petals. Some have considered these distinct species. The flower consists of four sepals, numerous petals in many rows, the outer larger than the sepals, the inner gradually passing into the numerous stamens which follow in many circles, at first petaloid and broad with small anthers, the inner narrow with longer anthers, the innermost differently formed and sterile. The numerous carpels are sunk within a dilated torus, and produce albuminous edible seeds resembling peas. The plant was first discovered in Bolivia by Haenke, 1801; it first flowered in England in November, 1849, and in the United States in 1853. Compared with other water-lilies, the flowers most resemble those of Castalia, and the leaves those of Euryale.

Videstrela (vid-es-trel'dā), n. [NL. (Lafresnaye, 1850), < Vid(ua) + Estrela.] A genus of Viduinæ, detached from Vidua for the wire-tailed veuves or whidah-birds, which have in the male the four middle tail-feathers wire-shafted with a racket at the end: later called Tetrænura (Reichenbach, 1861). The type and only species is V. regia, of South Africa, through the Transvaal to the Zambesi, and in the west to Damaraland. This is the veuve de la cote d'Afrique and veuve à quatre brins of early French ornithologists, the shaft-tailed bunting of Latham (1783), the Vidua regia of most writers. The male is 12 inches long, of which length the middle tail-feathers form three fourths or more: the color is black, varied with white, gray, brown, and buff; the bill and feet are coral-red. See cut in preceding column.

vidette (vi-det'), n. Same as redette.

Vidian (vid'i-an), a. [ < Vidius (see def.) + -an.] Relating or dedicated to the Italian anatomist Guido Guidi, Latinized Vidius (16th century): specifically applied in anatomy to several parts.

vidimus (vid'i-mus), n. [So called from this word indorsed on the papers: L. vidimus, 'we have seen,' 1st pers. pl. perf. ind. of videre, see: see vision.] 1. An examination or inspection: as, a vidimus of accounts or documents.—2. An abstract or syllabus of the contents of a document, book, or the like.

vidonia (vi-dō'ni-ā), n. [Cf. Pg. vidonho, a vine-branch (cf. videira, a vine), < vide, a vine-branch, = Sp. vid, a vine, = It. vite, a vine, < L. vitis, a vine.] A dry wine from the Canary Islands, formerly much in fashion in England.

Vidua (vid'ū-ā), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), a Latinized form, as if < L. vidua, a widow, tr. F. veuve, the name of the widow-bird, itself a translation of the E. widow or widow-bird, confused with widow: see whidah-bird.] An African genus of Ploceidæ, giving name to the Principal Whidah-bird (Vidua principalis), male.

Viduinæ; the veuves, widow-birds, or whidah-birds. No type having been originally indicated, the name is practically continuous with Viduinæ in a narrow sense, and has been variously restricted by different writers, notably to V. principalis and V. (Videstrela) regia. The former of these has in the male the four middle tail-feathers immensely lengthened and wide throughout their length (not wire-shafted). It was originally described (and figured) by Edwards in 1760 as the long-tailed sparrow, by Brisson in the same year as la veuve d'Angola, by Linnaeus in 1766 as Emberiza vidua, E. principalis, and E. serena, by Latham in 1783 as the long-tailed, variegated, and Dominican bunting, and by Cuvier in 1817 as Vidua principalis. The male is 10 inches long, of which length the ample middle tail-feathers make two thirds or more, the rest of the tail being scarcely 2 inches, and the wing being only 3; the color is black and white, chiefly massed in large areas, and varied with some buff and gray. The female lacks the extraordinary development of the tail, being scarcely 5 inches long, and is also quite different in color from the male. This bird is widely distributed in Africa. A second species is V. hypocherina (or splendens) of the Zanzibar district. For V. regia, see Videstrela; and for other forms, see Viduinæ.

viduage (vid'ū-āj), n. [ < L. vidua, a widow (see widow), + -age.] The condition of a widow; widowhood; widows collectively.

vidual (vid'ū-āl), a. [ < L. vidualis, of or pertaining to a widow, < vidua, a widow: see widow.] Of, pertaining, or relating to the state of a widow. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, ii. 3.

viduate (vid'ū-āt), n. [ < L. viduatus, pp. of viduare, widow: see viduation.] Eccles., the office or position of one of the order of widows; the order itself.

viduation (vid'ū-ā'shon), n. [ < L. viduatus, pp. of viduare, bereave, widow, < vidua, a widow, viduus, widowed: see widow.] The state of being widowed; bereavement.

Viduinæ (vid'ū-i'nē), n. pl. [NL. < Vidua + -inæ.] A subfamily of Ploceidæ, named from the genus Vidua; the whidahs and related forms: variously restricted. (a) In a broad sense, lately adopted by some monographers, one of two sub-Paradise Whidah-bird (Steganura paradisea), male.

families of Ploceidæ, containing all those with very short or spurious first primary of slender falcate form, of whatever other character: opposed to Ploceinæ alone. It thus covers a very large series of about 40 genera of not only African, but also Oriental, etc., birds, including those usually called Spermestinæ, as wax-bills, amadavats, blood-finches, senegals, strawberry-finches, sociable weavers, etc. See Philetærus, Pyrenestes, Quelea, Spermestes, Anadina, Teniopygia, Estrela, with various cuts. (b) In a narrow sense, confined to those African forms in the males of which the tail is longer than the wings, sometimes extraordinarily lengthened into an arched train or of other special figure; the whidahs proper. Two of these remarkable birds are described under Vidua and Videstrela respectively. A third is the widow of paradise, Vidua (or Steganura) paradisea. This was first described and figured by Edwards in 1747 as the red-breasted long-tailed finch; by the early French ornithologists as grande veuve d'Angola and veuve à collier d'or; and is the original whidah-bird of Latham, 1783. In the male the four middle tail-feathers are broad and flattened, and two of them taper to mere filaments; the length is 11 inches, of which the tail makes 8; the wing is 3 inches; the color is chiefly black, varied with white, brown, and buff, and especially marked with a collar of orange-rufous. The female is quite different in color, and 6 inches long, of which the tail is only 2. This whidah is widely distributed in Africa, and is the one oftenest seen in cages. A fourth is Vidua (Linura) fischeri, of East Africa, 10 inches long, with all four of the middle tail-feathers wired throughout. The foregoing are all the species in which the four middle tail-feathers are peculiar and the rest plain. But in other whidahs all the rectrices share more or less elongation. Such belong to the three genera Chera, Cotuspasser (or Penthetria), and Penthetriopsis. Chera procne of South Africa is the epaulet-whidah, of which the male is glossy-black above and below, with scarlet shoulders, and 19 inches long, with a tail of 15 inches. This is the only member of its genus. The species of Cotuspasser are several, of which the best-known is C. ardens (with nearly twenty other New Latin names). The male of this is black above and below with a scarlet collar across the fore neck; it inhabits South Africa. C. latianthus, C. hartlaubii, C. albonotata, and C. eque are the other species of this genus. The three members of the genus Penthetriopsis furnish the remaining type of whidahs, in which the males are black, varied with bright-yellow, as P. macrura of western and equatorial Africa, and P. macrocera of northeastern Africa.

viduity (vi-dū'i-ti), n. [ < L. viduita (-t)-s, widowhood, < vidua, a widow: see widow.] Widowhood. Bp. Hall, Honour of Married Clergy, i. § 6.

viduous (vid'ū-us), a. [ < L. viduus, widowed, bereft: see widow.] Widowed. [Rare.]

She gone, and her viduous mansion, your heart, to let, her successor the new occupant . . . finds her miniature. Thackeray, Newcomes, lxi.

9. In law, an inspection by the jury of property or a place the appearance or condition of which is involved in the case, or useful to enable the jury to understand the testimony, as of a place where a crime has been committed.—10. Specifically, inspection of a dead body;

an autopsy.—11t. The footing of a beast. Hallmark. Bird's-eye view. See bird's-eye. Dissolving views, a name given to pictures thrown on a screen by a lantern in such manner that they appear to dissolve every one into that following, without any interval of blank between them. To cause the pictures to "dissolve," two lanterns are required, each of which projects its picture upon the same field on the screen, both being in the same focus. One picture being projected, to cause it to disappear gradually and the next to take its place, a sliding cap or hood is mechanically withdrawn from the front of the second lantern and placed before the first lantern. Another method is to turn on the gas of one lantern while shutting off the gas of the other. The result is the same by either method, the first picture disappearing as the second appears, the two melting one into the other till one is lost and the other becomes clear. By a recent improved method only one lantern is used, and by appropriate mechanism a picture is substituted for that preceding it so quickly that there is no appreciation of any interval between them.—Field of view. See field. In view of, in consideration of; having regard to.—On view, open or submitted to public inspection; exhibited to the public: as, pictures placed on view.—Point of view. Which, by the splendour of her view Dazzled before, we ever knew.

Walter, The Night-Piece.

9. In law, an inspection by the jury of property or a place the appearance or condition of which is involved in the case, or useful to enable the jury to understand the testimony, as of a place where a crime has been committed.—10. Specifically, inspection of a dead body;

an autopsy.—11t. The footing of a beast. Hallmark. Bird's-eye view. See bird's-eye. Dissolving views, a name given to pictures thrown on a screen by a lantern in such manner that they appear to dissolve every one into that following, without any interval of blank between them. To cause the pictures to "dissolve," two lanterns are required, each of which projects its picture upon the same field on the screen, both being in the same focus. One picture being projected, to cause it to disappear gradually and the next to take its place, a sliding cap or hood is mechanically withdrawn from the front of the second lantern and placed before the first lantern. Another method is to turn on the gas of one lantern while shutting off the gas of the other. The result is the same by either method, the first picture disappearing as the second appears, the two melting one into the other till one is lost and the other becomes clear. By a recent improved method only one lantern is used, and by appropriate mechanism a picture is substituted for that preceding it so quickly that there is no appreciation of any interval between them.—Field of view. See field. In view of, in consideration of; having regard to.—On view, open or submitted to public inspection; exhibited to the public: as, pictures placed on view.—Point of view. See point.—Side view. See side and side-view.—To the view, so as to be seen by everybody; in public.

viewy (vū'i), a. [< view + -y.] 1. Holding, or prone to hold, peculiar views; given to views or schemes that are speculative rather than practical; holding the notions of a doctrinaire; visionary. [Colloq.]

Shetfield, on the other hand, without possessing any real view of things more than Charles, was at this time fond of hunting for views, and more in danger of taking up false ones — that is, he was viewy, in a bad sense of the word.

J. H. Newman, Loss and Gain, i. 3.

A man's identification with the movement was taken as proof that he was viewy and unfit for leadership.

The American, VI. 278.

2. Showy. [Colloq.]

They [chesters of drawers] would hold together for a time, . . . and that was all; but the slaughterers cared only to have them viewy and cheap.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, III. 230.

vifda, vifda (vif'dä, vif'dä), n. [Perhaps < Icel. vifdat, pp. of velfa, wave, vibrate; cf. Sw. vifsta, Dan. vifte, fan, winnow: see waft.] In Orkney and Shetland, beef or mutton hung and dried without salt. Scott, Pirate, xxix.

vigesimal (vi-jes'i-mäl), a. [< L. vigesimus, vicesimus, twentieth, < viginti, twenty: see twenty.] Twentieth.

vigesimation (vi-jes-i-mä'shon), n. [< L. vigesimus, twentieth, + -ation;] formed in imitation of decimation.] The act of putting to death every twentieth man. [Rare.]

vigia (vi-jä'), n. [< Sp. vigia, a lookout, < vigiar, look out, < vigilia, a watching: see vigil.] A hydrographical warning on a chart, to denote that the pinnacle of a rock, or a shoal, may exist thereabout. Hamersly.

vigil (vij'il), n. [Formerly also vigile; < ME. vigil, vigile, vigilie, < OF. vigile, vigilie, F. vigile = Sp. Pg. It. vigilia, a watching, vigil, < L. vigilia, a waking or watching, < vigil, waking, watchful (cf. AS. wacol, watchful), < vigere, be lively: see wake.] Hence (from L. vigil) vigilant, etc.]

1. The act of keeping awake; abstinence or forbearance from sleep at the natural or ordinary hours of rest; the state of being awake during the natural time for sleep; sleeplessness; wakefulness; watch: commonly in the plural.

There is nothing that wears out a fine face like the vigils of the card-table.

Addison, Guardian, No. 120.

2. Devotional watching; hence, devotions, services, praise, prayer, or the like performed during the customary hours of sleep; nocturnal devotions: commonly in the plural.

So they in heaven their odes and vigils tuned.

Milton, P. R., i. 182.

At Mary's Tomb (sad, sacred Place!)

The Virtues shall their Vigils keep.

Prior, Ode Presented to the King, st. 1.

3. Eccles.: (a) Originally, in the early church, the watch kept in a church or cemetery on the night before a feast, the time being occupied in prayer. The assembly on such occasions often leading to disorders, the custom of holding such vigils came to be abandoned in the eleventh or twelfth century. A trace of the old custom remains in the matins, lauds, and midnight mass before Christmas day. Hence—(b) The day and night preceding a festival; strictly, an eve which is a fast. Special offices or the use of the collect of the festival mark the vigil. If the day before such a festival is Sunday, the fast is transferred to the previous Saturday. Vigils are observed in the Roman Catholic, the Greek, the Anglican, and other churches.

He that shall live this day, and see old age,
Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours,
And say, "To-morrow is St. Crispian."

Shak., Hen. V., iv. 3. 45.

4t. A wake.

Coma vigil. See coma.—Vigils or watchings of flowers, a term applied by Linnaeus to the opening and shutting of certain flowers at regular hours of the day. See sleep, n., 5.

vigilance (vij'i-lans), n. [< F. vigilance = Sp. vigilancia = It. vigilanza, vigilanzia, < L. vigilantia, watchfulness, < vigilan(t)-s, wakeful, watchful: see vigilant.] 1t. Wakefulness.

Mr. Baxter seems to have thought that the connexion between the soul and the body subsisted only during a state of vigilance.

Priestley, Disquisitions.

2. The state or character of being vigilant; watchfulness in discovering or guarding against danger, or in providing for safety; circumspection; caution.

To teach them Vigilance by false Alarms.

Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 33.

His face is unruddied, his speech is courteous, till vigilance is laid asleep.

Macaulay, Machiavelli.

3. Specifically, watchfulness during the hours of night.

Ulysses yielded unseasonably [to sleep], and the strong passion and love for his country that so fully possess'd his soul should have given him . . . vigilance.

Broome, Notes on the Odyssey, xiii. 142.

4. In med., a form of insomnia.—5. A guard or watch. [Rare and obsolete.]

vigintivirate (vi-jin-tiv'i-rät), n. [< L. viginti, twenty, + vir, man, + -ate.] A body of officers of government consisting of twenty men. [Rare.]

Vigna (vin'nä), n. [NL. (Savi, 1822), named after Dominico Vigna, professor of botany at Pisa in 1628.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Phaseoleæ and subtribe Euphaseoleæ.

It is distinguished from the type genus (Phaseolus) by the absence of a beak upon the keel-petals, or by the failure of the beak, if developed, to form a perfect spiral. There are about 45 species, natives of warm regions of both hemispheres. They are usually twining or prostrate herbs, with pinnate leaves of three leaflets, and yellowish or rarely purplish flowers in a short cluster upon an axillary peduncle, followed by cylindrical pods which become greatly elongated — sometimes, it is said, a yard long. For V. catiana, universally cultivated in the tropics, and now also in southern parts of Europe and the United States, see chourlee, and cow-pea (under pea); its typical form is low and somewhat erect; when tall and climbing, it has been known as V. sinensis. V. lanceolata of Australia, also edible, produces, besides the ordinary cylindrical pods, others from buried flowers fruiting under ground, and resembling the peanut. V. luteola is known as seaside bean, and V. unguiculata as red bean, in the West Indies. One species occurs in the United States, V. glabra, a yellow-flowered hirsute twiner of brackish marshes from South Carolina to Mississippi.

vignette (vin-yet' or vin'yet'), n. [Formerly also vignett; < F. vignette, dim. of vigne, vineyard, vine, < L. vinea, a vine: see vine.] 1. A running ornament of vine-leaves, tendrils, and grapes, as in architecture.—2. The flourishes in the form of vine-leaves, branches, etc., with which capital letters in manuscripts are sometimes surrounded.—3. In printing, the engraved illustration or decoration that precedes a title-page or the beginning of a chapter: so called because many of the cuts first made for books in France were inclosed with a border of the general character of trailing vines.—4. Hence, any image or picture; a cut or illustration.

Her imagination was full of pictures, . . . divine vignettes of mild spring or mellow autumn moments.

Assisi, in the January twilight, looked like a vignette out of some brown old missal.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 213.

In bright vignettes, and each complete,

Tennyson, The Daisy.

5. A photographic portrait showing only the head, or the head and shoulders, and so printed that the ground shades off insensibly around the subject into an even color, which may be that of the untreated paper, or a more or less dark shade produced by a separate operation; hence, any picture, not a portrait, treated in the same way.

vignette (vin-yet'), v. t.; pret. and pp. vignetted, ppr. vignetting. [< vignette, n.] In photog., to treat or produce, as a portrait, in the style of a vignette.

vignetter (vin-yet'er), n. In photog., any device for causing the edges of a printed part of a negative to fade away evenly and gradually into the background. A form of vignetter may be interposed between the camera and the subject, so that the portrait will be vignetted directly on the negative. See vignetting-glass and vignetting-paper.

vignetting-glass (vin-yet'ing-glās), n. In photog., a glass frame for the same use and made on the same principles as the vignetting-paper. A usual form has an aperture of clear glass in the middle, around which are carried thin layers of tissue-paper, every layer projecting a little beyond that placed upon it. Another form is of deep-orange glass, with a center of white glass, the gradation being effected by grinding away the edge of the encircling orange part. Also called vignetter.

vignetting-mask (vin-yet'ing-māsk), n. Same as vignetting-paper.

vignetting-paper (vin-yet'ing-pā'pēr), n. In photog., a mask used in printing vignette pictures. It is a sheet of thin paper with a piece of the desired size left clear and semi-transparent in the middle, proceeding from which shading is carried in an opaque color so as gradually to attain complete opacity, and thus cause the strongly printed part of the negative in the middle to fade by even gradation around its edge to the color of the unprinted paper. Also called vignetter and vignetting-mask.

vignite (vig'nit), n. A magnetic iron ore.

vignoble (vë-nyô'bl), n. [F., a vineyard, < vigne, vine: see vine.] A vineyard.

whence comes the choicest of our Bordeaux wines.

Evelyn, Diary, July 13, 1683.

vignonia (vi-gō'ni-ä), n. Same as vicugna.

A herd of thirty-six, including the kinds called llamas, alpacas, and vicunas or vignonas, were sent from Lima.

Ure, Dict., III. 136.

Vigo plaster. See plaster.

vigor, vigour (vig'or), n. [< OF. (and F.) viqueur = Sp. Pg. vigor = It. vigore, < L. vigor, activity, force, < vigere, flourish, thrive, be lively. Cf. vigil, wake. Hence vigor, v., invigorate.] 1. Active strength or force of body; physical force; a flourishing physical condition; also, strength of mind; mental health and power; by extension, force of healthy growth in plants.

Brutus had rather be a villager
Than to repute himself a son of Rome
Under these hard conditions.

Shak., J. C., i. 2. 172.

villageryt (vil'aj-ri), n. [< village + -(e)ry.] A group of villages.

The maidens of the villageryt. Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 35.

villain (vil'an), n. and a. [Also archaically, in legal and historical use, villain; formerly sometimes villan, early mod. E. vilayn, etc.; *< ME. vilain, vilcin, vilcyn, also sometimes vilains, vilans, vileyns, < OF. vilain, vilcin, vilcin, vilcin, nom. also vilains, vilainz, F. vilain, a farm-servant, serf, peasant, clown, scoundrel, also adj. base, mean, wicked, = Pr. vilan, vila = Sp. villano = Pg. villão = It. villano, < ML. villanus, a farm-servant, serf, clown, < L. villa, a farm: see vill. The forms villain, vilcin, etc., are historically one, and the attempt to differentiate them in meaning is idle.] I. n. 1. A member of the lowest class of unfree persons during the prevalence of the feudal system; a feudal serf. In respect to their lords or owners the villains had no rights, except that the lord might not kill or maim them, or ravish the females; they could acquire or hold no property against their lord's will; they were obliged to perform all the menial services he demanded; and the cottages and plots of land they occupied were held merely at his will. In respect, however, of other persons besides their lord they had the rights and privileges of freemen. Villains were either regardant (which see) or in gross. They were in view of the law annexed to the soil (adscripti or adscriptitii glebe), belonging to a manor as fixtures, passing with it when it was conveyed or inherited, and they could not be sold or transferred as persons separate from the land. The latter belonged personally to their lord, who could sell or transfer them at will.*

Villain? by my blood,
I am as free-born as your Venice duke!

Middleton, Blurt, Master-Constable, ii. 1.

The villains owe to the lord all sorts of dues and services, personal labour, among others, on the lands which form his domain; they may not leave the Manor without his permission; no one of them can succeed to the land of another without his assent; and the legal theory even is that the movable property of the villain belongs to the lord. Yet it may confidently be laid down that in the light of modern research, none of these disadvantages prove an absolutely servile status, and that all may be explained without reference to it.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 305.

The villain was not a slave, but a freeman minus the very important rights of his lord.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 320.

Hence—2. An ignoble or base-born person generally; a boor, peasant, or clown.

Pour the blood of the villain in one basin, and the blood of the gentleman in another, what difference shall here be proved?

Bacon.

May. Where is your mistress, villain? when went she abroad?

Pren. Abroad, sir! why, as soon as she was up, sir.

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 3.

3. A man of ignoble or base character; especially, one who is guilty or capable of gross wickedness; a scoundrel; a knave; a rascal; a rogue: often used humorously in affectionate or jocose reproach.

One may smile, and smile, and be a villain.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 108.

This ring is mine; he was a villain
That stole it from my hand; he was a villain
That put it into yours.

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 3.

II. a. 1. Of or pertaining to, or consisting of, villains or serfs.

The villain class, notwithstanding legal and canonical hindrances, aspired to holy orders as one of the avenues to liberty.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 405.

2. Characteristic of or befitting a villain or slave; servile; base; villainous.

For thou art the moste villain knight that euer I mette in my lif.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 690.

He hadde haue he, that villain [read villain?] knight, that asketh eny tribute of eny tracllyng knightes.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), p. 127.

Villains sinful dedes make a cherl.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, i. 302.

Villain bonds and despot away.

Byron, Giaour.

Villain services, in feudal law, base or menial services performed in consideration of the tenure of land.

The records of the villain services will be jealously scanned in the present state of the controversy on the question of the village community.

Athenæum, No. 3141, p. 11.

Villain socage. See socage.

villainet (vil'an), v. t. [Early mod. E. also villayn; < villain, n.] To debase; degrade; villainize.

When they haue once villainet the sacrament of matrimony.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 344.

villainage (vil'an-aj), n. [< villain + -age. Cf. villainage.] The condition of a villain or peasant.

While the churl sank to the state of villainage, the slave rose to it.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 322.

villainize (vil'an-iz), v. t. [Also villanize; < villain + -ize.] To debase; degrade; defame; revile; calumniate.

Were virtue by descent, a noble name

Could never villanize his father's fame.

Dryden, Wife of Bath's Tale, i. 405.

villainizer (vil'an-i-zér), n. [Also villanizer; < villainize + -er.] One who villainizes.

villainly, adv. [ME. villainly; < villain + -ly.] Wretchedly; wickedly; villainously.

And there was oure Lord first scourged; for he was scourged and villainly entred in many places.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 95.

villainous (vil'an-us), a. [Also villanous, and archaically villenous; < villain + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to, befitting, or having the character of a villain, in any sense; especially, very wicked or depraved; extremely vile.

One that hath spoke most villanous speeches of the duke.

Shak., M. for M., v. i. 265.

2. Proceeding from extreme wickedness or depravity: as, a villainous action.—3. Of things, very bad; dreadful; mean; vile; wretched.

This villanous salt-petre should be digg'd
Out of the bowels of the harmless earth.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 60.

A many of these fears
Would put me into some villainous disease,
Should they come thick upon me.

B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 1.

Villanous, spiteful luck! I'll hold my life some of these saucy drawers betrayed him.

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 2.

Villainous judgment, in old Eng. law, a judgment which deprived one of his lex libera, which discredited and disabled him as a juror or witness, forfeited his goods and chattels and lands for life, wasted the lands, razed the houses, rooted up the trees, and committed his body to prison. Wharton. = Syn. Execrable, Abominable, etc. See unfair.

villainous (vil'an-us), adv. [< villainous, a.] In a vile manner or way; villainously.

With foreheads villainous low.

Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 250.

villainously (vil'an-us-li), adv. In a villainous manner, in any sense. Also villanously.

The streets are so villainously narrow that there is not room in all Paris to turn a wheelbarrow.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, vii. 17.

villainousness (vil'an-us-nes), n. The state or character of being villainous; baseness; extreme depravity; villainess.

villainy (vil'an-i), n.; pl. villainies (-iz). [Also villany; *< ME. *villainie, villanie, villeinie, vilaince, vilcinie, vileynge, vilcynge, vilcynge, vilcynge, vilcynge, < OF. vilainie, vilcinie, vilcinie, vilcinie, vilcinie, of a farm-servant, = Sp. villania = Pg. It. villania, < ML. villania, the condition of a farm-servant, villainy, < villanus, a farm-servant, villain: see villain. The proper etymological spelling is villany, the form villainy, with the corresponding forms in ME. and OF. (with diphthong ai or ei), being erroneously conformed to the noun villain, in which the diphthong has a historical basis.] 1†. The condition of a villain or serf; rusticity.*

The entertainment we have had of him
Is far from villany or servitude.

Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I, iii. 2.

2. The character of being villainous; the qualities characteristic of a villain; extreme depravity; atrocious wickedness.

Corsed worth cowarddysse & couetys bothe!

In yow is vylany & vyse, that vertue distreyge.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), i. 2375.

Fear not the frowne of grim authority,
Or stab of truth-aborring villanie.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 2.

3†. Discourteous or abusive language; opprobrious terms.

He nevere yet no vileynye ne sayde

In al his lyf unto no maner wight.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., i. 70.

Therefore he wolde not that thei sholde speke eny euell of hym ne vileynye.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 643.

4. A villainous act; a crime.

For, God it woot, men may wel offende

A lordes sone do shame and vileynye.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, i. 295.

If I wer ther without I had the mor sadder or wurcheffull persones about me, and ther comyn a meny of knyvs, and prevayled in ther entent, it shuld be to me but a vileynye.

Paston Letters, II. 308.

Cæsar's splendid villany achieved its most signal triumph.

Macaulay, Machiavelli.

A private stage

For training infant villanies. Browning, Strafford.

5†. Disgraceful conduct; conduct unbecoming a gentleman.

If we hennes hye

Thus sodeynly, I holde it vilenye.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 490.

Agravaun, brother, where be ye, now lete se what ye do, for I payne me for these ladyes sake for curtesie, and ye payne yow for theire vilonyes.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 530.

= Syn. 2. Baseness, turpitude, atrocity, infamy. See ne-farious.

villakin (vil'ä-kin), n. [< villa + -kin.] 1. A little villa.

I am every day building villakins, and have given over that of castles. Gay, To Swift, March 31, 1730. (Latham.)

2. A little village.

villiant, n. An obsolete spelling of villain.

villanage, n. See villanage.

villancico (vê-lyan-thê'kô), n. [Sp., a rustic song, < villano, of the country, rustic: see villain.] A kind of song, akin to the madrigal, popular in Spain in the fifteenth century, consisting of seven-lined stanzas. The melodies to which such songs were sung were often taken as the themes of contrapuntal music, and hence certain motets are still called villancicos.

villanella (vil'a-nel'ä), n. [It. villanella, < villano, rustic: see villain.] An Italian rustic part-song without accompaniment, the precursor of the more refined and artistic canzonetta and madrigal. It was not supposed to be amenable to the strict rules of composition. Also villotte.

villanelle (vil'a-nel'), n. [F., < It. villanella: see villanella.] A poem in a fixed form borrowed from the French, and allied to the virelay. It consists of nineteen lines on two rhymes, arranged in six stanzas, the first five of three lines, the last of four. The first and third line of the first stanza are repeated alternately as last lines from the second to the fifth stanza, and they conclude the sixth stanza. Great skill is required to introduce them naturally. The typical example of the villanelle is one by Jean Passerat (1534–1602), beginning "J'ai perdu ma tourtourelle."

Who ever heard true Grief relate
Its heartfelt Woes in "six" and "eight"?
Or felt his manly Bosom swell

Within a French-made Villanelle? A. Dobson.

villanette (vil'a-net'), n. [< villa + -n-ette.] A small villa or residence.

villiform (vil'i-fôr'm), a. [L. villus, shaggy hair, + form, form.] Villous in form; like villi; as, villiform process or to the touch; resembling the papillae of the velvet; having the character of a set of villi.

villiplacental (vil-i-pla-sen'tal), a. [L. villus, shaggy hair, + placenta, placenta.] Having a villous placenta of the kind peculiar to some of the mammals, as the hoofed quadrupeds, suinates, and cetaceans.

Villiplacentalia (vil-i-pla-sen-tā'li-ä), n. pl. [L. villus, shaggy hair, + placenta, placenta.] A series of indeciduate mammals having a tufted or villous placenta. It consists of the Lagudata, Sirenia, and Cetacea.

villitis (vil'i-tis), n. [L. villus, shaggy hair, + itis, inflammation.] Inflammation of the coronary cushion or of the substance of the hoof-wall of the horse, leading to the formation of imperfect hoofs. Also called coronitis.

villoid (vil'oid), a. [L. villus, shaggy hair, + -oid, resembling.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling villi or fine hairs; villiform.

villous (vil'us), a. Same as villous. Bailey.

villosity (vil'os-i-ti), n.; pl. villosities (-tiz). [= F. villosité, L. villus, shaggy; see villous.] 1. A number of villi together; a roughness or shaginess resulting from villiform processes; a nap or pile, as of an organic membrane; fine or short hairiness; pilosity.

The villosities may also be peopled with numerous bacilli. Sanitarian, XVI, 529.

2. In bot., the state of being villous, or covered with long, soft hairs; such hairs collectively.

villotte (vil'ot'), n. Same as villanella.

villous (vil'us), a. [= F. villus = It. villosus, L. villus, shaggy hair, shaggy hair; see villus.] 1. Having villi; abounding in villiform processes; covered with fine hairs or woolly substance; nappy; shaggy; finely hirsute or hispid; as, a villous membrane.—2. In bot., pubescent with long and soft hairs which are not interwoven.—Villous cancer, papilloma.

villus (vil'us), n.; pl. villi (-i). [L. villus, shaggy hair, a tuft of hair.] 1. In anat.: (a) One of numerous minute vascular projections from the mucous membrane of the intestine, of a conical, cylindrical, clubbed, or filiform shape, consisting essentially of a lacteal vessel as a central axis, with an arteriole and a veinlet, inclosed in a layer of epithelium, with the basement membrane and muscular tissue of the mucous membrane, and cellular or reticular tissue.

The villi occur chiefly in the small intestine, and especially in the upper part of that tube; there are estimated to be several millions in man; they collectively constitute the beginnings of the absorbent or lacteal vessels of the intestine. See also cut under lymphatic. (b) One of the little vascular tufts or processes of the shaggy chorion of an ovum or embryo, in later stages of development entering into the formation of the fetal part of the placenta. See cut under uterus. (c) Some villiform part or process of various animals. See cut under hydranth.—2. In bot., one of the long, straight, and soft hairs which sometimes cover the fruit, flowers, and other parts of plants.—Arachnoid villi, the Pacchionian bodies or glands. Intestinal villi. See def. 1.

Vilmorinia (vil-mo-rin'i-ä), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), named after P. V. L. de Vilmorin (1746-1804), a noted French gardener.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Galeae and subtribe Roburceae. It is characterized by odd pinnate leaves, an elongated tubular calyx, oblong petals the wings shorter than the keel, and by a wingless, minutely stalked pod. The only species, V. multicolor, is a native of the East Indies, with downy leaves of five or six pairs of leaflets. It bears axillary racemes of handsome purple flowers and is sometimes cultivated under the name of Vilmorin's pea-flower.

vim (vim), n. [L. vim, acc. of vis, strength, force, power, energy, in particular hostile force, violence, + Gr. αἰς (ais), strength.] The active form seems to have been taken up in school or college, from the frequent L. phrases per vim, by force, vim facere, use force, etc.] Vigor; energy; activity. [Colloq.]

The men I find at the head of the great enterprises of this coast [California] have great business power—a wide practical reach—a boldness, a sagacity, a vim, that I do not believe can be matched anywhere in the world.

S. Butler, in Merriam, 11, 7.

vimen (vi'men), n. [NL., L. vimen (-in-), a plant twig, a wither, < vireo, twist together, plait; see vireo, with 2.] In bot., a long and flexible shoot of a plant.

viminal (vim'i-nal), a. [L. viminalis, of or pertaining to twigs or osiers, < vimen (-in-), a twig; see vimen.] Of or pertaining to twigs or shoots; consisting of twigs; producing twigs. Blount.

Viminaria (vim-i-pā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Smith, 1804), so called from its rush-like twiggy branches and petioles; < L. vimen, a twig; see vimen.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Podalyriaceae. It is characterized by a slightly five-toothed calyx, ample banner-petal, connate keel-petals, an ovoid indehiscent pod, and commonly a solitary seed with a small strophiole. It is peculiar in the absence of leaves, which are represented only by filiform elongated petioles (rarely bearing from one to three small leaflets), and adding to the broom-like effect of the elongated slender branches. The only species, V. denudata, is a native of Australia, there known as scamp-oak and as scamp or rush-broom; its flowers are small, orange-yellow, borne in terminal racemes.

vimineous (vi-min'ē-us), a. [L. vimineus, made of twigs or osiers, < vimen (-in-), a twig, a wither; see vimen.] 1. Made of twigs or shoots. [Rare.]

In a Hive's vimineous Dome
Ten thousand Bees enjoy their Home.

Prior, Alma, 111.

2. In bot., made up of or bearing long, flexible twigs; viminal.

vina (vā'nā), n. [Also veena; Skt. vīṇā.] A Hindu musical instrument of the guitar family, having seven strings stretched over a long finger-board of bamboo which rests on two gourds and has about twenty frets, the position of which may be varied at the pleasure of the performer. In playing the instrument, one gourd is placed on the shoulder and one on the hip.

Also binā.

vinaceous (vi-nā'shi-us), a. [L. vinaceus, pertaining to wine or to the grape, < vinum, wine; see vine.] 1. Belonging to wine or grapes.—2. Wine-colored; claret-colored; red, like wine.

vinage (vi'naj), n. [< vine + -age.] The addition of spirit to wine to preserve it or enable it to withstand transportation.

Vinago (vi-nā'gō), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), earlier in Willughby and Ray, equiv. to anas, so called with ref. to the vinaceous color of the neck; < L. vinum, wine, grapes; see vine.] 1. An extensive genus of Old World fruit-pigeons, variously applied in some restricted senses; exactly synonymous with Treron (which see).—2. [L. c.] Any pigeon of this genus; formerly, some other pigeon.

vinaigrette (vin-ä-gret'), n. [F. vinaigrette, < vinaigre, vinegar; see vinegar. Cf. vinegar-ette.] 1. A small bottle or box used for carrying about the person some drug having a strong and pungent odor, commonly aromatic vinegar. It is usually fitted with a double cover, the inner one made of openwork or pierced, the drug being either in solid form or held by a fragment of sponge.

2. A vinegar sauce. [Rare.]—3. A small two-wheeled vehicle to be drawn like a Bath chair by a boy or a man. Simmonds. [Rare.]

vinaigrier (vi-nā'gri-er), n. [= F. vinaigrier, < vinaigre, vinegar; see vinegar.] The whip-scorpion, Thaliphonus giganteus; same as gram-pus, 6. See vinegar.

vinaigrous (vi-nā'grus), a. [F. vinaigre, vinegar, + -ous.] Sour like vinegar; hence, crabbed, peevish, or ill-tempered.

The fair Palace Dames publicly declare that this Lafayette, detestable though he be, is their saviour for once. Even the ancient vinaigrous Tantes admit it. Carte, French Rev., I, vii, 9.

Vinalia (vi-nā'li-ä), n. pl. [L. pl. of vinalis, of or pertaining to wine, < vinum, wine; see vine.] In Rom. antiq., a double festival, celebrated on April 22d and on August 19th, at which an offering of wine from the vintage of the preceding autumn was made to Jupiter.

Two Villi of the Small Intestine, magnified 100 times.
a, Lacteal vessel of the villus;
b, the capillary epithelium, three detached cells of which are seen at b'; c, the artery, and d, the vein, with their connecting capillary network enveloping and holding the lacteal radicle, which occupies the center of the villus and opens into a network of lacteal vessels at its base.

Vinaigrette of French workmanship.

vinarian (vi-nā'-ri-an), a. [< L. vinarius, of or pertaining to wine, < vinum, wine: see wine.] Having to do with wine.—Vinarian cup, a large and ornamental drinking-cup, especially of Italian origin.

vinarian (vi-nā'-ri-us), a. Same as vinarian. Blount, 1670.

vinasse (vi-nas'), n. [< F. vinasse = Pr. vinaci = Sp. vinaca = It. vinaccia, drags of pressed grapes, < L. vinacea, a grape-skin, < vinum, wine: see wine.] The potash obtained from the residue of the wine-press; also, the residuum in a still after the process of distillation.

The spirit is then distilled off, leaving a liquor, usually called vinasse, which contains all the original potash salts. Spon's Encyc. Manuf., I. 258.

Calined vinasse, the result of evaporating to dryness and calcining the vinasse remaining from the distillation of fermented beet-root. From it are obtained various potash salts. It is technically called salin.

vinata (vi-nā' tã), n. [It.] An Italian vintage-song.

vinatico (vi-nat' i-kō), n. [< Pg. vinhatico, wine-colored, < vinho, wine: see wine.] A laureaceous tree, Phæbe (Persea) Indica, or its wood. It is a noble tree, native in Madeira, the Canaries, and the Azores. The wood is hard and beautiful, like a coarse mahogany, sought for fine furniture and turning.

Vinca (ving' kä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), earlier as Pervinca (Tournefort, 1700), and Vincapervinca (Brunfels, 1530), < L. vinca, vinecapervinca, and vinca pervinca, periwinkle: see periwinkle.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Apocynaceæ, tribe Plumeriez, and subtribe Euplumeriez. It is characterized by solitary axillary flowers, a stigma densely and plumosely tufted with hairs, a disk consisting of two scales, biseriate ovules, and a fruit of terete follicles. There are about 12 species, with numerous ovules and normal lanceolate anthers; and Pervinca, species chiefly of the Mediterranean region, with usually six to eight ovules in each carpel, and with peculiar short anther-cells borne on the margin of a broad connective. They are erect or procumbent herbs or undershrubs, with opposite leaves, and usually attractive flowers of moderate size. The species are known as periwinkle (see periwinkle), and cuts under periwinkle (and opposite). V. major is locally known in England as band-plant and cut-finger, and V. rosea in Jamaica as old-maid.

Vincentian (vin-sen'shian), a. [< Vincent (St. Vincent de Paul) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Saint Vincent de Paul (1576-1660): specifically applied to certain religious associations of which he was the founder or patron.—Vincentian Congregation, an association of secular priests, devoted to hearing confession, relieving the poor, and directing the education of the clergy.

vincetoxicum (vin-sē-tok' si-kum), n. [NL., < L. vincere, conquer, + toxicum, poison: see toxic.] The official name of the swallowwort or tame-poison, Cynanchum (Asclepias) Vincetoxicum, the root of which was formerly esteemed as a counter-poison. Both root and leaves have emetic properties.

vincibility (vin-si-bil' i-ti), n. [< vincible + -ity (see -bility).] The state or character of being vincible; capability of being conquered.

The vincibility of such a love. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 49. (Davies.)

vincible (vin'si-bl), a. [< L. vincibilis, that can be easily gained or overcome, < vincere, conquer: see victor.] Capable of being vanquished, conquered, or subdued; conquerable.

The man cannot . . . be concluded a heretic unless his opinion be an open recession from plain demonstrative Divine authority (which must needs be notorious, voluntary, vincible, and criminal).

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 373.

Nor is any prejudice deeper, or less vincible, than that of profane minds against religion.

J. Howe, The Living Temple, Works, I. 1.

vincibleness (vin'si-bl-nes), n. Vincibility.

vinciture (ving' tūr), n. [< L. vincitura, a bandage, a ligature, < vincere, bind.] A binding.

Blount, 1670.

vincula, n. Plural of vinculum.

Vincularia (vin-kū-lā'-ri-ä), n. [NL. (De-france), < L. vinculum, a band: see vinculum.] The typical genus of Vinculariidae, whose members are found fossil from the Carboniferous onward and living at the present time.

Vinculariidae (vin-kū-lā'-ri-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vincularia + -idae.] A family of chilosomatous gymnomelatomous polyzoans, whose typical genus is Vincularia, having no epistome or circular lophophore, and a movable lip of the mouth of the cells. Also called Microporidae.

vinculate (ving' kü-lät), v. t.; pret. and pp. vinculated, ppr. vinculating. [< L. vinculus, pp. of vinculare (> It. vincolare = Sp. Pg. vincular), bind, < vinculum, a band: see vinculum.] To tie; bind. [Rare.]

Rev. John Angell James of Birmingham—the man whom Dr. Cox described as “angel vinculated between two apostles.” The Congregationalist, July 7, 1887.

vinculum (ving' kü-lum), n.; pl. vincula (-lä). [NL., < L. vinculum, contr. vinculum, a band, bond, rope, cord, fetter, tie, < vincere, bind.]

1. A bond of union; a bond; a tie.—2. In alg., a character in the form of a stroke or brace drawn over a quantity when it consists of several terms, in order to connect them together as one quantity and show that they are to be multiplied or divided, etc., together:

thus,  $a + b \times c$ , indicates that the sum of  $a$  and  $b$  is to be multiplied by  $c$ ; whereas the expression without this character would indicate simply that  $b$  is to be multiplied by  $c$ , and the product added to  $a$ .—3. In printing, a brace.—4. In anat., a tendinous or ligamentous band uniting certain parts; a frenum. The reason why we cannot stretch out the middle or ring finger very well without the other fingers is because of vincula which connect the several extensor tendons of the fingers so that they do not work separately.—Divorce a vinculo matrimonii, in law, an entire release from the bond of matrimony, with freedom to marry again.—Vincula accessoria tendinum, small folds of synovial membrane between the flexor tendons and bones of the fingers. They are of two sets—the ligamenta brevia, passing between the tendons near their insertions and the lower part of the phalanx immediately above, and the ligamenta longa, joining the tendons at a higher level.—Vinculum subflavum, a small band of yellow elastic tissue in the ligamentum breve of the deep flexor tendons of the hand, stretching from the tendon to the head of the second phalanx. See vincula accessoria tendinum.

vin-de-fimes (F. pron. van' dē-fēm'), n. [Origin obscure.] The juice of elderberries boiled with cream of tartar and filtered: used by wine-makers to give a rose tint to white wine. Simmonds.

Cf. fiddle, prob. a doublet of viol. Hence violin<sup>1</sup>, violoncello, etc.] 1. A musical instrument with strings, essentially not greatly different from the lute and the guitar, except that the strings are sounded by means of a bow drawn across them, not by plucking them with the fingers. The viol is the typical representative of a very large, varied, and widely distributed class of instruments, of which in modern music the violin is the chief member. The type includes the following characteristics: a hollow resonance-box or body, made of a front or belly (which is pierced with one or two sound-holes of varying shape), a back (both front and back being flat or only slightly arched), and sides of various contour according to the particular variety and the period; within the body an internal system of braces, including a sound-post, to withstand the strain of the strings and to give the tone greater sonority; a more or less elongated neck, often with a special finger-board in front, and surmounted by a head, part of which serves as a peg-box; several strings, mostly of gut, fastened at the bottom either to the body directly or to a tail-piece, stretched thence over a bridge and over the finger-board and neck, and fastened at the top to pegs by which their tension and tune can be adjusted; and a bow for sounding the strings, consisting of a stick or back of wood and a large number of horse-hairs whose friction is augmented by the application of rosin. The differences between different instruments of the family in shape, size, number and tuning of strings, and method of manipulation are very numerous and apparently important; but the essential similarity between all the varieties is greater than is commonly thought. The historic genesis of the typical idea of the viol is disputed. By some its origin is asserted to be found in the gradual development, with the addition of sounding by means of a bow, of the ancient lyre into the monochord and the vielle, with various incidental modifications in shape and adjustment. By some its precursor is thought to be the Oriental rebab, or some similar instrument, transplanted into southern Europe, and modified by contact with the traditions of the lyre and monochord. By others great historic importance is attached to the Celtic crowd of western Europe. The problem is greatly complicated by the confusing use of terms in the middle ages, the same name being given to quite distinct instruments, and the same instrument being known by two or three different names. Apparently, also, somewhat distinct lines of development went on simultaneously in Italy, in Germany, and in western Europe. Probably the medieval viol, which reached its most distinctive development in the fifteenth century, was the joint result of several more or less distinct tendencies. It was characterized by a flat back, from five to seven strings tuned in fourths and thirds, a broad, thin neck, and a close amalgamation of the neck with the body. This viol was made in several sizes. The smallest (treble or descant viol) passed over later into the modern violin; the next larger (tenor), into the viola da braccio and viola d'amore and the modern viola; the next (bass), into the viola da gamba and the modern violoncello; and the largest (double-bass), into the violine and the modern double-bass viol.

What did he doe with her brest bone? . . .

He made him a viall to play thereupon.

The Miller and the King's Daughter (Child's Ballads, II, [358]).

The worst can sing or play his part o' th' Viols.

And act his part too in a comely.

Brome, Antipodes, i, 5.

2†. A large rope formerly used in purchasing an anchor: same as messenger, 4. It was made to lead through one or more blocks before it was brought to the capstan, thus giving additional power.—Bass viol, either one of the larger of the medieval viols (see def. 1), or the modern violinello.—Chest or consort of viols. See chest<sup>1</sup>.—Division viol. Same as viola da gamba.—Viol d'amore. See viola d'amore, under viola<sup>1</sup>.

Viola, in which the long stalked leaves are clustered at the top of a thick fleshy rhizome, which also bears the numerous distinct leafless scapes; and the leafy-stemmed species, which are mostly with spreading or somewhat erect stems bearing numerous leaves, usually on shorter petioles (see cut under viola). Several species produce long runners, as V. blanda, the sweet white violet; V. canadensis, the largest, reaches sometimes 2 feet high; and V. pedata, the largest-flowered, has the flowers sometimes nearly 2 inches across. The 13 Californian species are chiefly leafy-stemmed, showy, quite local, and peculiar in their yellow flowers with purple veins and brown backs: V. pedunculata, the common species, grows in clustered colonies, with flowers often an inch and a half across; V. ocellata of the Mendocino forests is remarkable for its purple spots. V. Langsdorffii is abundant on the Aleutian Islands, and the genus extends north to Kotzebue Sound. The British species are 6, of which V. odorata, also occurring from central Europe to Sweden, Siberia, and Cashmere, is the sweet or English violet, often doubled, and called tea violet in cultivation; and V. canina is the dog- or hedge-violet, without odor, but graceful in form, imparting much of the beauty of spring to English mountain districts. There are 50 species in Europe, over 20 in China, of which V. Patrinii is the most common, and 11 in the mountains of India. In the southern hemisphere, where the species are usually shrubby, there are over 30 in the mountains of South America, elsewhere few, 4 in Australia, of which the chief is V. heterocarpa, 2 in New Zealand, and 1 in Cape Colony. Five peculiar species occur in the Hawaiian Islands, of which V. robusta produces a woody stem sometimes 3 feet high, and V. hololepis a large snow-white waxy flower sometimes 2 inches across. A few somewhat shrubby species occur northward, as V. arborescens, the tree-violet. V. scandens of Peru is a climbing and V. acuta a twining shrub; V. decumbens of Cape Colony, a much branched proeminent shrub; V. plicatilis of New Zealand, a smooth, slender mountain-creeper. The pansy and other species are of some medicinal use. For V. tricolor, see pansy and heart's-ease (its small form is known in the United States as Johnny-jump-up and lady's-delight). For other species, see violet.

violable (vi'ô-lâ-bli), a. [= F. violable = Sp. violable = Pg. violable = It. violabile, < L. violabilis, that may be violated, < violare, violate: see violate.] Capable of being violated, broken, or injured. Bailey.

parts, the quills and crown crimson; a bare scarlet patch about the eye, below this a white stripe; the bill orange-red fading to yellow on the frontal half; the eyes brown; the feet black; and the head not crested. The only other species of the genus, M. rosea, is rather larger, crested, without any white stripe, and has the bare circumbuccal area edged with violet-blue. It inhabits equatorial Africa. M. violacea was named by Lesson in 1789, when the genus was introduced, and is the fourcoid violet on musapha of Levaillant. M. rosea was named by Gould in 1851.

Violariæ (vi'ô-lâ-rî'ë-ë), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1805), < Violaria, for Viola, + -æ.] A cohort of polypetalous plants, of the series Thalamifloræ and cohort Parietales. It is characterized by flowers usually with five petals, five sepals, and as many perfect stamens; by anthers nearly or quite connate around the pistil, introrsely dehiscent, and commonly with an appendaged connective; and by a one-celled ovary, commonly with three placentæ and a medium-sized embryo in fleshy albumen. There are over 250 species, belonging to 25 genera, classed in 4 tribes, of which the type are Viola, Panopopoda, Abies, and Saxifraga, the last being aberrant in the presence of stamens. With the exception of the genus Viola, they consist chiefly of tropical shrubs with deciduous stipules, sometimes small trees, and mostly with but few species in each genus. They usually bear alternate simple entire or toothed leaves, and axillary flowers which are solitary, or form racemose or panicle cymes, followed by capsules which are commonly loculicidal. Their roots often have emetic properties, and in South America many species, especially of Ionidium, are used as substitutes for ipecacuanha. The order is largely American, two genera Viola and Ionidium, occur within the United States. Also Violaceæ.

violascens (vi'ô-lâ'shëns), a. A variant of violaceus.

violaster (vi'ô-lâ'stër), n. [ME. violastre, < OF. violastre, F. violâtre, of a violet color, purplish, < violet, violet: see violet.] See the quotation.

Daisies pied and violets blue.

Shak., L. L. L., v. 2. 904.

2. A general class of colors, of which the violet-flower is a highly chromatic example. In the spectrum the violet extends from h to H, covering all the upper part of the spectrum ordinarily visible. This color can be produced by a slight admixture of red to blue; and colors somewhat more red than the upper part of the spectrum are called violet. But the sensation of violet is produced by a pure blue whose chroma has been diminished while its luminosity has been increased. Thus, blue and violet are the same color, though the sensations are different. A mere increase of illumination may cause a violet blue to appear violet, with a diminution of apparent chroma. This color, called violet or blue according to the quality of the sensation it excites, is one of the three fundamental colors of Young's theory. It is nearly complementary to the color of brightness, so that deep shades generally appear by contrast of a violet tinge; and the light of a rainy day, and still more of a sudden tempest, has a violet appearance. Even the pure yellow of the spectrum, so reduced as to be barely visible, looks violet beside the same light in great intensity.

3. Any one of the many different small blue or violet butterflies of Lycæna, Polyommatus, and allied genera.—Acid violet, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, being the sodium salt of di-methyl-rosaniline trisulphonic acid. It is applicable to wool and silk.—Aniline violet. Same as mauve.—Arrow-leaved violet, Viola sagittata of the eastern half of the United States, much resembling the common blue violet, except in the form of its leaves.—Bird's-foot violet, a low stemless species, Viola pedata, of the same region, having pedately divided leaves, and fine large light-blue or whitish flowers, yellow-eyed with the stamens. A variety is the pansy violet.—Calathian violet, the marsh-gentian, Gentiana Pneumonanthe. According to Gerard, the true plant was a Campanula. Britton and Holland.—Canada violet, Viola canadensis, a species common northward and in the mountains of eastern North America, having an upright stem a foot or two high, and white petals purplish beneath.—Common or early blue violet, Viola palmata, especially in the variety caucullata, very common in moist ground in North America. The leaves are more or less palmately lobed, or in the variety only crenate. The size and shape of the leaves are variable, as also the color of the petals, which are deep- or pale-blue, or purple, or sometimes white or variegated.—Corn-violet. See Specularia.—Crystal violet. See crystal.—Damask violet. Same as dame's violet.—Dog-tooth violet, a plant of the genus Erythronium. The yellow dog-tooth violet is E. americanum.—Dog-violet, Viola canina of the northern Old World, and in the variety Muhlenbergii of North America. It is a stemmed violet a few inches high, with light-violet petals and a short cylindrical spur.

—English violet. See sweet violet.—Fringe or fringed violet, Arthropodium paniculatum and Thysanotus tuberosus, lilaceous plants of Australia with rather small panicled blue flowers, those of the former with crisped inner segments. Green violet. See Ionidium.—Hoffmann's violet. Same as dahlia, 3.—Hooded violet, a plant of the tropical American genus Corynolobus (Calyptrium), related to the violets.—Horned violet (or pansy), Viola cornuta of the Pyrenees, having pale-blue or mauve-colored sweet-scented spurred flowers, produced abundantly and continuously, long cultivated in Europe, and forming an excellent border- or bedding-plant.—Lance-leaved violet, the American Viola lanceolata, with small white flowers.—Long-spurred violet, Viola rostrata of the eastern and central United States, having a low stem and pale-violet flowers with a slender spur.—Manganese violet, in ceram., the purple color obtained by the use of manganese.—March violet, the sweet violet. Britton and Holland. (Local, Eng.)—Marian's violet. Same as marlet.—Marsh-violet. (a) Viola palustris, a species with small blue flowers marked with purple; found northward in both hemispheres. (b) Locally, same as dog-violet.—Mars violet, an artificially prepared oxid of iron, used as a pigment by artists. It resembles Indian red, but is darker in color. Also called mineral purple.—Mercury's violet. Same as Marian's violet.—Naphthalene violet. Same as naphthamein.—Neapolitan violet. See sweet violet.—New fast violet. Same as gallocyanine.—New Holland violet. Same as spursless violet.—Pale violet, Viola striata of central and eastern North America, a stemmed species having white petals lined with purple.—Pansy violet, a local name for the variety bicolor of the bird's-foot violet, Viola pedata. The two upper petals are of a deep-violet color and as if velvety. Also velvet violet.—Paris violet. Same as mythyl-violet.—Perkin's violet. Same as indisin.—Primrose-leaved violet, Viola primulaefolia of the eastern United States, with small white flowers.—Rosaniline violet, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, being the hydrochloride of mono- and di-phenyl-rosaniline. They produce a dull but moderately fast violet color on cotton, wool, and silk. Also called phenyl violet, spirit violet, Gamma violet, imperial violet, etc.—Round-leaved violet, Viola rotundifolia of cold woods in eastern North America, a species with small yellow flowers, the leaves at first erect, roundish-ovate, an inch broad, in summer 3 or 4 inches long, lying flat on the ground, shining above.—Sand violet, Viola arenaria, a small tufted stemless species with pale-blue flowers, found in the northern Old World.—Spursless violet, specifically, Viola hederacea of Australasia, once classed as a distinct genus Erpeton, a tufted or widely creeping plant with rather small blue flowers.—Spurred violet, a pretty South form serpent, as a cobra, asp, or adder; also, loosely, any serpent that is venomous, or supposed to be so; a dangerous, repulsive, or ugly snake. In the United States the name is commonly but erroneously applied to various spotted snakes especially to some supposed to be venomous, but in fact innocuous; as, the water-viper, Atractodes piscivorus, the water moccasin, poisonous; the blowing viper and black viper, Heterodon platirhinos and H. niger, both harmless, though of formidable and repulsive aspect. See cuts under asp, cobra-de-capello, copperhead, moccasin, and pit-viper.

3. In her., a serpent used as a bearing. Some writers avoid the word serpent and use viper instead, there being no difference in the representations.

4. One who or that which is mischievous or malignant.

Where is that viper? bring the villain forth.

Shak., Othello, v. 2. 285.

Thou painted viper!
Beast that thou art!

Shelley, The Cenci, i. 3.

See cut under daboya.—Pit viper. See pit-viper.—Plumed viper, a puff-adder. See Crotalus.—Red viper. Same as copperhead, 1.—Viper's dance, St. Vitus's dance. Hall's [Prov. Eng.].—Water-viper. See def. 2.—Yellow viper. See yellow.

Vipera (vī'pĕ-rā), n. [NL. (Laurenti, 1768), < L. vipera, a viper: see viper.] A genus of serpents, giving name to the Viperidae. Formerly it was applied with little discrimination to a great number of venomous viviparous species and others. It is now restricted to a small genus of the family Viperidae, of which the common viper of Europe (V. aspis, V. communis or Pelias) is the type, having the urosteges two-rowed and the nostril between two plates. Also called Pelias. See Viperidae, and cuts under adder and viper.

viperess (vī'pĕr-es), n. [< viper + -ess.] A female viper.

Would we fain'd, but hear Pontia confess,
My Sons I would have poison'd: Viperess!
Stapylton, tr. of Juvenal (ed. 1660), vi. 670.

viper-fish (vī'pĕr-fish), n. A fish of the family Chauliodontidae and genus Chauliodus, specifically C. sloani. This is a deep-sea fish of Mediterranean and Atlantic waters, a foot long, greenish above, blackish below, silvery on the sides, with about thirty phosphorescent spots in a row from the chin to the ventral fins.

viper-gourd (vī'pĕr-gōrd), n. Same as snake-gourd. See gourd.

Viperidae (vī'pĕr-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vipera + -idae.] The vipers; one of four families into which the suborder Viperina or Solenoglypha, of the order Ophidia, is divided, distinguished from the Crotalidae by the absence of a pit between the eye and the nostrils, and from the Atretaspididae and Causidae by the presence of a postfrontal bone in connection with ungrooved fangs. All the Viperidae are venomous, and nearly all inhabit the Old World only. According to the latest view of the family, it includes 7 genera: Vipera, of which Pelias is a synonym; Daboia (see daboya); Crotalus, the horned vipers; Bitis (with which Echidna is synonymous); Crotalus, see viper.] I. a. Resembling or related to the viper; of or pertaining to the Viperina, especially in the narrower sense: broadly distinguished from colubrine, more strictly contrasted with crotaline.—Viperine snake. (a) Any member of the Viperina. (b) A harmless colubrine serpent of Europe, Tropidonotus viperina, colored much like the true viper. See cut under snake.

II. n. A member of the Viperina; a viper. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 198.

viperish (vī'pĕr-ish), a. [< viper + -ish.] Like a viper; somewhat viperous; malignant; ugly: as, a viperish old woman.

viperling (vī'pĕr-ling), n. [< viper + -ling.] A young or small viper.

viperoid (vī'pĕr-oid), a. [< viper + -oid.] Viperine in a broad sense; of or pertaining to the Viperoidae.

Viperoidea, Viperoides (vī'pĕr-oi'dē-ā, -dēz), n. pl. [NL.: see viperoid.] Same as Viperina, 1.

viperous (vī'pĕr-us), a. [< viper + -ous.] Having the qualities of a viper; viperish; venomous; malignant; spiteful: chiefly said of mental qualities, or used figuratively.

Which, though it repeated the world, yet is it least beholding to her viperous offspring.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 340.

Mr. Chubb cast a suspicious and viperous glance at Felix, who felt that he had been a simpleton for his pains.

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xi.

viperously (vī'pĕr-us-li), adv. In a viperous manner; like a viper.

Having spoken as maliciously & viperously as he might . . . of Wicliffe's life. Holinshead, Richard II., an. 1377.

viper's-bugloss (vī'pĕrz-bū'glos), n. See Echium.

viper's-grass (vī'pĕrz-grās), n. See Scorzonera.

viper-wine (vī'pĕr-win), n. See the quotation.

When his [Sir Robert Cotton's] abilities decayed, he drank sack in which snakes were dissolved, being commonly called viper-wine, to restore nature.

Court and Times of Charles I., II. 112, note.

viraginian (vir-ā-jin'i-an), a. [< L. virago (-gin-), a bold woman, + -ian.] Having the qualities of a virago; termagant.

The remembrance of his old conversation among the viraginian trollops. Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

viraginity (vir-ā-jin'i-ti), n. [< L. virago (-gin-), a bold woman, + -ity.] The qualities of a virago. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

viraginous (vir-ā-jin-i-nus), a. [< L. virago (-gin-), a bold woman, + -ous.] Same as viraginian.

A man is placed in the same uneasy situation as before described (riding the stag), so that he may be supposed to represent . . . his henpecked friend. . . . He is carried through the whole hamlet, with a view of exposing or shaming the viraginous lady.

Brockett, Gloss. of North Country Words, p. 206.

virago (vi-or vi-rā'gō), n. [< L. virago, a bold woman, a man-like woman, an Amazon, + vir, man: see virile.] 1. A woman of extraordinary stature, strength, and courage; a woman who has the robust body and masculine mind of a man; a female warrior.

She . . . proceedeth like a Virago stoutly and cherefully to the fire, where the corps of her husbande was burnt, casting her selfe into the same fyre.

R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 24).

"To arms, to arms!" the fierce virago cries,
And swift as lightning to the combat flies.

Pope, R. of the L., v. 37.

Hence—2. A bold, impudent, turbulent woman; a termagant: now the usual meaning.

When I distress her so again, may I lose her forever! and be linked instead to some antique virago, whose gnawing passions, and long hoarded spleen, shall make me curse my folly.

Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 2.

3. [cap.] [NL. (A. Newton, 1871).] A genus of Anatinae: so called because the female has a peculiarity of the windpipe usually found only in male ducks. The species is V. punctata (or castanea) of Australia.

virago-sleeve (vī-rā'gō-slēv), n. A full sleeve worn by women about the middle of the seventeenth century.

Virchow-Robin lymph-spaces. The spaces between the adventitia and the inner coats of the cerebral vessels.

vire† (vēr), [*< ME. vyre, < OF. vire = Pr. Sp. Pg. vira, a crossbow-bolt; cf. dim. Sp. virote, It. verretta, veretta, a spear; prob. a contraction of Sp. vibora = Pg. vibora, a viper, = OF. *viure, also viure (> E. wiver), F. viure, a serpent, viper, also an arrow, < L. vipera, a viper: see viper and wiver. The supposed contraction may have been due to association with OF. virer, turn.*] 1. A bolt for a crossbow, feathered spirally so as to rotate in its flight. Also vireton.

The head of a vire or veron, a heavy arrow which was discharged from a large cross-bow.

H. S. Cuning, Jour. Brit. Archæol. Ass., XI. 143.

2. In her., same as annulet. Cussans.

vire† (vēr), v. An obsolete spelling of veer.

virelay (vir'e-lā), n. [< F. virelai, < vire, turn, change direction (see veer), + lai, a song, lay: see lay.] An old French form of poem, in short lines, running on two rimes; also, a succession of stanzas on two rimes, and of indeterminate length, the rime of the last line of each becoming the rime of the first couplet in the next, thus: a, a, b, a, a, b, a, a, b; b, b, c, b, b, c; c, c, d, c, c, d, c, c, d; etc. In a nine-line lay the rime-order is as follows: a, a, b, a, a, b, a, a, b. The virelai nouveau is written on two rimes throughout; and the lines of the first couplet reappear alternately at irregular intervals throughout the poem, concluding it in reverse order. No rime should be repeated. This form has been written in English but sparingly. Except by example, it is difficult to explain it. Here is the beginning of one:

Good-bye to the Town!—good-bye!

Hurrah! for the sea and the sky!

In the street the flower-girls cry;

In the street the water-carts ply;

And a fluter, with features a-wry,

Plays fitfully, "Scots, wha hae!"

And the throat of that fluter is dry;

Good-bye to the Town!—good-bye!

And over the roof-tops nigh

Come a waft like a dream of the May,—etc.

The next paragraph closing with:

Hurrah! for the sea and the sky!

A. Dobson, July.]

Virelay, a roundelay, Country-ballad, or Freemans song. Bount, 1670.

And then the band of flutes began to play,

To which a lady sung a virelay.

Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 365.

virent (vī'rent), a. [< L. viren(t)-s, ppr. of virere, be green, fresh, or vigorous. Cf. virid, verd, verdant, etc.] Green; verdant; fresh.

In these, yet fresh and virent, they carve out the figures of men and women. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

Vireo (vir'e-ō), n. [NL., < L. vireo, a kind of bird, a greenfinch.] 1. A genus of small greenish oscine or singing passerine birds of America, the type of the family Vireonidae, and including most of the species of that family; the greenlets. See Vireonidae, and cuts under greenlet and solitary.—2. [l. c.] A greenlet; any bird of the family Vireonidae, especially of the genus Vireo.—Arizona vireo, the gray vireo. Baird, Brewer, and Ridgway, 1874.—Bell's vireo, V. belli, a very small greenlet of the United States from Illinois westward, and south into Mexico, discovered by Audubon on the upper Missouri, and named by him in 1844 after John Bell, a New York taxidermist.—Black-capped or black-headed vireo, V. atricapillus, a rare and remarkable greenlet found from Texas to Mazatlan and southward, first described by Dr. S. W. Woodhouse in 1852 from specimens he procured on the San Pedro river. It has the cap jet-black, unlike any other vireo.—Black-whiskered vireo, one of the mustached greenlets, V. barbatulus, of Florida and the West Indies. See whip-tom-kelly.—Blue-headed vireo, the solitary vireo, whose cap is somewhat bluish, in contrast with the greenish of the other upper parts.—Cassin's vireo, the western variety of the solitary vireo. Xantus, 1859.—Gray vireo, V. vicinior, an isolated species discovered in Arizona by Coues in 1864.—Hutton's vireo, V. huttoni, a relative of the white-eye, found in California and Mexico. Cassin, 1851.—Lead-colored vireo, the plumbeous vireo. Baird, Brewer, and Ridgway, 1874.—Least vireo, V. pusillus, a very small greenlet discovered by Coues in 1864 in Arizona, and related to the gray and Bell's vireos.—Mustached vireo, one of several of the larger species which have maxillary streaks, especially the black-whiskered, or whip-tom-kelly.—Philadelphia vireo, the brotherly-love greenlet, discovered by John Cassin near the city of that name, and originally described by him in 1851 as Vireosylva philadelphia. It belongs with the redeye in the slender-billed section of the large vireos, but in coloration is almost identical with the warbling vireo. It inhabits eastern parts of North America, north to Hudson's Bay, and extends to Guatemala in winter. It is more abundant in the Mississippi watershed than where originally found.—Plumbeous vireo, V. plumbeus, of the southern Rocky Mountain region and southward, discovered by Coues in Arizona in 1864. It resembles the solitary greenlet, but is much duller in color; the length is 6 inches.—Red-eyed vireo, the redeye (which see, with cut). Also called red-eyed flycatcher (after Catesby, 1771, Latham, Pennant, etc.), and formerly olive-colored flycatcher (Edwards).—Solitary vireo. See solitary.—Vigors's vireo. Same as Vigors's warbler (which see, under warbler).—Warbling vireo, V. gilvus, of all temperate eastern North America and southward. It is one of the smaller species, about 5 inches long and 8½ in extent, and very plainly colored; it inhabits high woodland, and has an exquisitely melodious warble, often heard from the shade and ornamental trees of parks and cities.—White-eyed vireo, V. noveboracensis (formerly Muscicapa noveboracensis, V. cantatrix, V. muscius, etc.), a small stout-bodied greenlet notable for the brightness of the olive parts, the richness of the yellow about the face and eyes and along the sides, and especially the white iris. It is scarcely 5 inches long and 8 in extent; it inhabits the the plumed vipers, or puff-adders, as C. arietans of Africa; Echis of Merrem, called Toxica by Gray; and Atheris of Cope, also called Pacilostolus. In the two latter the urosteges are single-rowed; in the rest, two-rowed. The generic distinctions of the first five are slight, chiefly resting upon the formation of the plates about the nostrils. See also cuts cited under viper, 1.

viperiform (vī'pĕr-i-form), a. [< L. vipera, a viper, + forma, form.] Having the form or structure of a viper; allied or belonging to the vipers: correlated with cobriniform and crotaliform.

Viperina (vī'pĕ-rī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < L. vipera, a viper, + -ina.] 1. A general name of venomous serpents: distinguished from Colubrina. Also called Nocua, Thanatophidia, Venenosa.—2. More exactly, one of two suborders of Ophidia, containing venomous serpents related to the viper. It corresponds to the modern suborder Solenoglypha, as distinguished from Proteroglypha, though of less exact definition than either of these. See cut under rattlesnake, and cuts cited under viper, 2.

viperine (vī'pĕ-rin), a. and n. [< L. viperinus, of or like a viper, < vipera, a viper, serpent:

see), usually quadrangular in shape and without legs, very popular in England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The word is much used in the plural, and also in the phrase a pair of virginals (see pair<sup>1</sup>, 5).

Have you played over all your old lessons o' the virginals?
Middletown, Chaste Maid, i. 1.

Prudence took them into a dining-room, where stood a pair of excellent virginals; so she played upon them, and turned what she had showed them into this excellent song.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

I observed that hardly one lighter or boat in three that had the goods of a house in but there was a pair of Virginal's in it.
Pepeys, Diary, II. 442.

He sent me to the boarding school; there I learned to dance and sing, to play on the bass viol, virginals, spinet, and guitar.

J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 23.

It is an acrid plant; the leaves are sometimes used as a rubefacient in rheumatism.—Upright virgin's-bower, Clematis recta (C. erecta), of southern Europe, a very acrid plant acting as a diuretic and diaphoretic, sometimes applied internally, and externally for ulcers.

Virgin-worship (vēr'jin-wēr'ship), n. Adoration of the Virgin Mary. See Mariolatry.

Virgo (vēr'gō), n. [NL., < L. virgo, maiden: see virgin.] An ancient constellation and sign of the zodiac. The figure represents a winged woman in a robe holding a spike of grain in her left hand. One of the stars was called Vindemictrix, or by the Greeks Protrygeter—that is, precursor of the vintage. At the time when the zodiac seems to have been formed, 2100 B.C., this star would first be seen at Babylon before sunrise about August 20th, or, since there is some evidence it was then brighter than it is now, perhaps a week earlier. This would seem too late for the vintage, so that perhaps this tradition is older than the zodiac. Virgo appears in the Egyptian zodiacs without wings, yet there seems no room to doubt that the figure was first meant for the winged Assyrian Astarte, especially as the sixth month in Accadian is called the "Errand of Istar." The symbol of the zodiacal sign is ♍, where a resemblance to a wing may be seen. The constellation contains the white first-magnitude star Spica. See cut in next column.

virgouleuse, virgoleuse, n. [< F. Virgoulée, a village near Limoges, in France.] A kind of pear. Also called white doynné, and by other names.

Virgularia (vēr-gū-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1816), < L. virgula, a little rod (see virgule), + -aria.] The typical genus of the family Virgulariæ, having the pinnae very short, as V. mirabilis.

Virgulariæ (vēr-gū-lā-rī'-i-æ), n. pl. [NL., < Virgularia + -iæ.] A family of pennatulaceous alcyonarian polyps, typified by the genus Virgularia; the sea-roads. They are related to the sea-pens, but are of long, slender, virgulate form. The rachis includes a slender axial rod, and the polypites are set in transverse rows or clusters on each side of nearly the whole length of the polypidom.

virgule (vēr'gūl), n. [< F. virgule, a comma, a little rod, < L. virgula, a little rod, dim. of virga, a rod: see verge<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A little rod; a twig.—2. A comma. Hallam, Lit. Hist. of Europe, i. 8. [Rare.]

Virgulin (vēr-gū-li-an), n. [So named from the abundance of Erogrya virgula which it contains; < virgula (see virgule) + -ian.] In geol., one of the subdivisions of the Jurassic, according to the nomenclature of the French geologists. It is the highest but one of four subages recognized in the Kimmeridgian of central France.

virgultum (vēr-gul'tum), n. [NL., < L. virgultum, a bush, contr. *< *virguletum, < virgula*, a little twig: see virgule.] A small twig; a sprout.

virial (vir'i-əl), n. [After G. virial (Clausius, 1870), < L. vis (vir-), force: see vim, vis<sup>3</sup>.] The sum of the attractions between all the pairs of particles of a system, each multiplied by the distance between the pair.—Theorem of the virial, the proposition that when a system of particles is in stationary motion its mean kinetic energy is equal to its virial.

virtued (vêr'tūd), a. [< virtue + -ed.] Endued with power or virtue; efficacious.

But hath the virtu'd steel a pow'r to move?

Or can the untouch'd needle point alike?

Quarles, Emblems, v. 4.

virtuefy (vêr'tū-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. virtuefied, ppr. virtuefying. [< virtue + -fy.] To give virtue to; impart the quality of virtue to. [Rare.]

It is this which virtuefies emotion, even though there be nothing virtuous which is not voluntary.

Chalmers, Constitution of Man, ii. (Encyc. Dict.) virtueless (vêr'tū-less), a. [< virtue + -less.] Destitute of virtue, potency, or efficacy; worthless.

And these digressive things

Are such as you may well endure, since (being deriv'd from kings,

And kings not poor nor virtueless) you cannot hold me base, Nor scorn my words, which oft, though true, in mean men meet disgrace.

Chapman, Iliad, xiv. 107.

Virtueless she wish'd all herbs and charms,

Wherewith false men increase their patients' harms.

Fairfax.

On the right hand of one of the marines of Salvator, in the Pitti palace, there is a passage of sea reflecting the sunrise, which is thoroughly good, and very like Turner; the rest of the picture, as the one opposite to it, utterly virtueless.

Ruskin, Mod. Painters, II. v. 1.

virtue-proof (vêr'tū-prôf), a. Irresistible in virtue.

She needed, virtue-proof; no thought intrude

Alter'd her cheek. Milton, P. L., v. 384.

virtuosa (vir-tō-ō'sä), n.; pl. virtuose (-se).

[It. see virtuoso.] The feminine of virtuoso.

A fine concert, in which La Diamantina, a famous virtuosa, played on the violin divinely, and sung angelically.

Gray, Letters, I. 76.

virtuose (vir-tō-ōs'), a. [< It. virtuoso: see virtuoso.] Same as virtuosic.

Mme. Carreno is essentially a virtuose player, and it was in pieces by Liszt that she astonished her audience.

The Academy, May 17, 1890, p. 346.

virtuosi, n. Italian plural of virtuoso.

virtuosic (vir-tō-ō'sik), a. [< virtuoso + -ic.]

Exhibiting the artistic qualities and skill of a virtuoso. [Rare.]

Of late we have had only fugitive pieces of the romantic, and even virtuosic, schools.

The Academy, April 13, 1889, p. 261.

virtuosity (vir-tō-ō'si-ti), n. [< virtuoso + -ity.] 1. Lovers of the elegant arts collectively; the virtuosi.

It was Zum Grünen Ganse, . . . where all the Virtuosity and nearly all the Intellect of the place assembled of an evening.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, I. 3.

2. In the fine arts, exceptional skill; highly cultivated dexterity; thorough control of technique. Virtuosity is really a condition to the highest artistic success, since it means a complete mastery of the materials and processes at the artist's disposal; but, inasmuch as the ready use of materials and processes is often in itself wonderful to the percipient, virtuosity is often erroneously cultivated and applauded for its own sake. The term is especially applied to music.

In this [inlaid work], as in the later work of most styles of art, mechanical virtuosity . . . was beginning to usurp the place of originality and purity of design.

G. C. M. Birdwood, Indian Arts, II. 44.

This gave to both performers a legitimate opportunity of displaying their virtuosity.

The Academy, June 15, 1889, p. 420.

Brilliance of technique is now the property of nearly every public performer, and instrumental music is being threatened by that decadence which all art history proves is the constant companion of virtuosity.

The Century, XXXV. 2.

virtuoso (vir-tō-ō'sō), n.; pl. virtuosos, virtuosi (-sōz, -si). [= F. virtuoso, < It. virtuoso, a virtuoso, lit. one who is excellent, i. e. excels in taste: see virtuosus.] 1†. An experimental philosopher; a student of things by direct observation.

Boyle.—2. One who has an instructed appreciation of artistic excellence; a person skilled in or having a critical taste for any of the elegant arts, as painting, sculpture, etc.; one having special knowledge or skill in antiquities, curiosities, and the like.

The Italians call a man a virtuoso who loves the noble arts and is a critic in them.

Dryden, On Dufresnoy's Art of Painting.

Our host . . . had been a Colonel in France; . . . was a true old blade, and had been a very curious virtuoso, as we found by a handsome collection of books, medals, . . . and other antiquities.

Evelyn, Diary, March 23, 1646.

Nothing can be pleasanter than to see a circle of these virtuosos about a cabinet of medals, descending upon the value, rarity, and authenticity of the several pieces that lie before them.

Addison, Ancient Medals, i.

If this virtuoso excels in one thing more than another, it is in canes.

Steele, Tatler, No. 142.

His house, indeed, would not much attract the admiration of the virtuoso. He built it himself, and it is remarkable only for its plainness.

Fielding, Amelia, iii. 12.

3. One who is a master of the mechanical part of a fine art, especially music, and who makes display of his dexterity. See virtuosity, 2.

The virtuoso afterwards exhibited his marvellous execution in solos by Paganini and Wieniawski.

The Academy, June 1, 1889, p. 386.

virtuosship (vir-tō-ō'sō-ship), n. [< virtuoso + -ship.] The occupation or pursuits of a virtuoso. Bp. Hurd.

virtuous (vêr'tū-us), a. [Early mod. E. also vertuous; < ME. vertuous, < OF. vertuous, vertueux, F. vertueux = Sp. Pg. It. virtuoso, virtuosus, excellent, effective, efficacious, < LL. virtuosus, good, virtuous, < L. virtus, excellence, virtue: see virtue.] 1†. Having or exhibiting manly strength and courage; valorous; brave; gallant.

Neuertheles whan Merlin saugh the Saisnes so vertouse, he ascride the kyng Ban: "Sir, what do ye now? ye myght haue hem putte oute of the place longe seth, for ye be moo peple be that oon half than thi be."

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 595.

Must all men that are virtuous Think suddenly to match themselves with me? I conquer'd him, and bravely; did I not?

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, i. 1.

2. Possessed of or exhibiting virtue; morally good; acting in conformity with right; discharging moral duties and obligations, and abstaining from immoral practices: as, a virtuous man.

A Man of excellent Parts of Body, and of no less Endowments of Mind; valiant and witty; to which if we might add vertuous, he had been complet.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 107.

It is the interest of the world that virtuous men should attain to greatness, because it gives them the power of doing good.

Dryden, Amboyna, Ded.

A virtuous mind cannot long esteem a base one.

Hamilton, To Miss Schuyler (Works, I. 187).

Indeed, as Aristotle says, our idea of a virtuous man includes the characteristic that he takes pleasure in doing virtuous actions.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 32.

3. Being in conformity to the moral or divine law: as, a virtuous deed; a virtuous life.

If what we call virtue be only virtuous because it is useful, it can only be virtuous when it is useful.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 45.

The beauty of a virtuous action may be explained as consisting in its relation to the virtuous character in which it has its source, or to the other acts of a virtuous life, or to the general condition of a virtuous state of society.

Fowler, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 67.

If there is any virtuous action performed at any time, that in it which constitutes it virtuous is the motive of universal love which is its impelling force.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLVII. 570.

4. Chaste; pure; modest.

Mistress Ford, . . . the modest wife, the virtuous creature, that hath the jealous fool to her husband.

Shak., M. W., iv. 2. 136.

Her beauty was beyond compare, She was both virtuous and fair.

The Suffolk Miracle (Child's Ballads, I. 218).

5†. Efficacious by inherent qualities; having singular or eminent properties or powers; potent; effective.

Ther nas no man nowhere so vertuous; He was the beste beggere in his hous.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., I. 251.

This priuettee is so vertuous that the vertu therof may not al be declarid.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnival), p. 8.

Culling from every flower The virtuous sweets.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 76.

The ladies sought around For virtuous herbs, which, gather'd from the ground, They squeeze'd the juice and cooling ointment made.

Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 418.

=Syn. 2 and 3. Upright, exemplary, worthy, righteous. See morality.

virtuously (vêr'tū-us-li), adv. In a virtuous manner; in conformity with the moral law or with duty; chastely; honorably.

The gods are my witnesses I desire to do virtuously.

Sir P. Sidney.

I knew you lov'd her, virtuously you lov'd her.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, ii. 2.

And I'll be your true servant, Ever from this hour virtuously to love you, Chastely and modestly to look upon you.

Fletcher, Rule a Wife, v. 5.

virtuousness (vêr'tū-us-nes), n. [Early mod. E. also vertuousnes; < virtuous + -ness.] The state or character of being virtuous.

Polemon . . . from thensforth becam a Phi'er [philosopher] of singular gravitee, of incomparable sobrenes, of moeste constante vertuousnes, and so contynued all his lif aftir.

Udall (Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 6).

The love of Britomart, . . . the vertuousnes of Belphebe.

Spenser, To Raleigh. Preface to F. Q.

virulence (vir-ô-lens), n. [< F. virulence = Sp. Pg. virulencia = It. virulenza, < LL. virulentia, an offensive odor, < L. virulentus, full of poison: see virulent.] The quality of being virulent, or charged with virus. (a) The quality or property of being extremely acrimonious or poisonous: as, the viru- visceripericardial (vis'e-ri-per-i-kär'di-al), a. [L. viscera, viscera, + pericardium, pericardium.] Common to the pericardium and other viscera: as, the peculiar visceripericardial sac of cephalopods. Also visceropericardial. E. R. Lankester.

visceromotor (vis'e-rō-mō'tor), a. Same as viscerimotor.

Viscero-motor nerves: seen to arise from both sympathetic and lumbosacral plexus for distribution to the pelvic viscera.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 105.

visceropericardial (vis'e-rō-per-i-kär'di-al), a. Same as visceripericardial.

The viscero-pericardial sac of the Dibranchs is very large also, and extends into the dorsal region.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 677.

visceropleural (vis'e-rō-plō'ral), a. [L. viscera, viscera, + NL. pleura.] Same as pleuro-visceral.

visceroskeletal (vis'e-rō-skē'l'e-tal), a. [L. viscera, viscera, + NL. skeleton.] Pertaining to the visceral skeleton, or, more generally, to the framework of the body on the visceral side; hypaxial or subvertebral, as a part of the skeleton; splanchnoskeletal.

viscid (vis'id), a. [LL. viscidus, clammy, sticky, < L. viscum, bird-lime, anything sticky: see viscum.] Sticky; having a sticky or glutinous consistency; produced by or covered by a tenacious coating or secretion. Blount, 1670.

viscidity (vis'id-i-ti), n. [= F. viscidité; as viscid + -ity.] 1. The state or quality of being viscid; glutinousness; tenacity; stickiness. Arbutnot, Aliments, i.—2. A glutinous concretion. [Rare.]

viscin (vis'in), n. [L. viscum, bird-lime, + -in-2.] A sticky substance, one of the components of bird-lime, derived from mistletoe.

viscometer (vis-kom'e-tēr), n. [L. viscum, bird-lime, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] Same as viscosimeter.

viscometry (vis-kom'e-tri), n. [As viscometer + -y.] The measurement of the viscosity of liquids.

viscosimeter (vis-kō-sim'e-tēr), n. [Irreg. < LL. viscosus, viscous, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An apparatus for measuring the viscosity of various liquids, as oils. Also viscometer.

viscosimetric (vis'kō-si-met'rik), a. Of or pertaining to a viscosimeter.

viscosimetrical (vis'kō-si-met'ri-kal), a. Same as viscosimetric.

viscosity (vis-kos'i-ti), n.; pl. viscosities (-tiz). [F. viscosité = Sp. viscosidad = Pg. viscosidade = It. viscosità, < LL. as if viscosita (-t-s, < viscosus, viscous; see viscus.] 1. The state or property of being viscous; the quality of flowing slowly, as pitch or castor-oil. Such liquids are commonly sticky, but this is no part of the viscosity.

Sub. And what's your mercury?

Face. A very fugitive; he will be gone, sir.

Sub. How know you him?

Face. By his viscosity,

His oleosity, and his scissibility.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

2. In physics, internal friction, a resistance to the motion of the molecules of a fluid body among themselves: opposed to mobility. Thus, the viscosity of such liquids as pitch and syrup is very great as compared with that of a mobile liquid like alcohol. A slow continuous change of the shape of solids or semisolids under the action of gravity or external force is also, by extension of the name, called viscosity: as, the viscosity of ice. Viscosity is proportional to the relative velocity of strata at a unit distance. The viscosity of gases and vapors is due to the molecules shooting from one stratum to another carrying their vis viva with them. The viscosity of liquids arises from an entirely different cause, namely, from the mutual attractions of the molecules, and is diminished by the effect of the wandering of the molecules. Consequently, the viscosity of gases increases while that of liquids diminishes as the temperature is raised.

Hence, if we attempt to cause one stratum of gas to pass over another in parallel planes, we experience a resistance due to the interchange of molecules between the portions of gas separated by the plane. This is in some respects analogous to sliding friction between solid bodies, and is called by German writers the "friction" (Reibung), by Maxwell and others the "viscosity" of the gas.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 619.

The viscosity of liquids presents a certain analogy with the malleability of solids.

W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., § 45.

3. A glutinous or viscous body.

Drops of syrups, oil, and seminal viscosities.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 4.

Dynamical coefficient of viscosity, kinetic coefficient of viscosity, also dynamic viscosity. See co- efficient.—Magnetic viscosity, that property of a magnetic medium which causes changes of magnetization to lag behind the change of effective magnetomotive force.

viscount (vi'kount), n. [Formerly vicount (the s being a later insertion in imitation of the F.); < ME. vicounte, viconte, < OF. viconte, visconte, F. viconte, < ML. vicecomes (-comit-), < L. vice, in place of (see vice), + comes, a companion: see count.] 1. Formerly, an officer who acted as deputy of a count or earl in the management of the affairs of the county; the sheriff of a county.

Vicount, alias Viscount (vice-comes) cometh of the French, . . . and signifieth with us as much as sheriffe. Betwene which two words I find no difference, but that the one cometh from our conquerours the Normans, and the other from our ancestors the Saxons. Cowell, 1637.

2. A degree or title of nobility next in rank below that of earl, and immediately above that of baron. It is the most recently established English title, having been first conferred by letters patent on John, sixth Baron Beaumont, by Henry VI., in 1440. In Great Britain the title is frequently attached to an earldom as a second title, and is by courtesy held by the eldest son during the lifetime of the father. The coronet of a viscount of England is composed of a circle of gold, chased, having on the edge twelve, fourteen, or sixteen pearls; the cap is of crimson velvet, turned up with ermine, and closed at the top with a rich tassel of gold. See cut under coronet.

A viscounts Eldest sonn is no Lord, nor no other of his sonn, nor none of his daughter[s] ladyes.

Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 28.

viscountcy (vi'kount-si), n. [viscount + -cy.] The rank or dignity of a viscount.

The Barony of Dacre (not Dacres) and the Viscountcy of Howard of Morpeth were conferred by Oliver Cromwell on Charles Howard. N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 446.

viscountess (vi'koun-tes), n. [OF. vicomtesse; as viscount + -ess.] 1. A peeress in rank next after a countess and before a baroness. The title is usually held by the wife of a viscount, but in Great Britain it may be inherited by a woman in her own right.

2. A size of slate. See the quotation.

Viscountesses (18 × 9). Encyc. Brit., XXII. 128.

viscountship (vi'kount-ship), n. [viscount + -ship.] The rank or dignity of a viscount.

viscounty (vi'kount-ti), n.; pl. viscounties (-tiz). [F. viconté, < ML. vicecomitatus, < vicecomes, viscount: see viscount.] Same as viscountship.

The house of lords, for so the baronage may be now called, underwent under the Lancastrian kings none but personal changes, and such formal modifications as the institution of marquessates and viscounties.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 368.

viscous (vis'kus), a. [= F. visqueux = Sp. Pg. It. viscoso, < LL. viscosus, sticky, < L. viscum, viscus, bird-lime; see viscum.] 1. Glutinous; clammy; sticky; adhesive; tenacious.

In some [men] it is nature to be somewhat viscous and unwrapped, and not easy to turn.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

My honeysuckles . . . being enveloped in a viscous substance, and loaded with black aphides.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. Selborne, To D. Barrington, lxi.

2. In physics, having the property of viscosity. See viscosity, 2.

When the very smallest stress, if continued long enough, will cause a constantly increasing change of form, the body must be regarded as a viscous fluid, however hard it may be.

Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 276.

Glacier ice, however hard and brittle it may appear, is really a viscous substance, resembling treacle, or honey, or tar, or lava.

Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 155.

Viscous fermentation. See fermentation, 2.

viscousness (vis'kus-nes), n. The state of being viscous; viscosity.

Viscum (vis'kum), n. [L. viscum, rarely viscus, mistletoe, bird-lime, = Gr. ἱξός (Ficōs), mistletoe.] 1. A genus of parasitic plants, including the mistletoe, type of the tribe Viscæ in the order Loranthaceæ. It is characterized by flowers usually clustered at the axils or summits of branches, and by anthers which are broad and adnate, opening by many pores on the inner face. There are about 30 species, widely dispersed throughout warm and temperate regions of the Old World. They are shrubs with opposite or dichotomous branches, parasitic on trees. The leaves are conspicuous, opposite, flat, and thickish, or are reduced to scales or minute teeth. The flowers are small, usually three to five together, sessile, and surrounded by two to three small bracts. Some of the species are distributed over a very wide area, especially V. orientale and V. album, the latter the well-known mistletoe.

2. [l. c.] Bird-lime.

viscus (vis'kus), n.; pl. viscera (vis'e-gi-ā). [NL., < L. viscus, pl. viscera, any internal organ of the body.] Any one of the interior organs of the body, contained in one of the four great cavities of the head, thorax, abdomen, and pelvis, as the brain, heart, lung, liver, stomach, intestine, kidney, bladder, womb, etc.; especially, an abdominal viscus, as the intestine: in ordi-

Thoracic viscera, with some of the abdominal viscera, showing line of the diaphragm which separates them, and outline of heart, aorta, and superior vena cava, with reference to the surface of the thorax; 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, in locate position of aortic, mitral, pulmonary, and tricuspid valves of the heart, respectively.

nary language generally in the plural, meaning the bowels or entrails; the vitals.

Mental states occasion also changes in the calibre of blood-vessels, or alteration in the heart-beats, or processes more subtle still, in glands and viscera.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 5.

His desk with a vice turning in it.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 164.

2t. The newel, or central shaft, of a winding staircase.

I ris and walkt, sought pace and pace,

Till I a winding staire found

And held the vice aye in my hand.

The Isle of Ladies, I. 1312.

The Standard, which was of mason work, costly made with images and angels, costly gilt with gold and azure, with other colours, and divers sorts of [coats of] arms costly set out, shall there continue and remain; and within the standard a vice with a chime.

Coronation of Queen Anne, Wife of Henry VIII., in [Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 49.]

3. A gripping or holding tool or appliance, fixed or portable, used to hold an object firmly in position while work is performed upon it. The vise is closely allied to the clamp; both have movable jaws that may be brought together to hold any object placed in position between the jaws. Vises are made in two parts, a, hand-vise; b, machinists' bench-vise; c, parallel vise; d, parallel vise, with small anvil d' in combination; e, blacksmiths' vise; f, carpenters' vise; g, pipe-vise; h, saw-filers' vise.

Vises.

forming jaws either joined together by a spring or a hinge-joint or arranged to move upon slides or guides. The jaws are moved by screws, levers, toggles, or ratchet and pawls, one jaw being usually fixed firmly to the bench or other support to which the vise is attached. Some forms are made adjustable at any angle; others have parallel motions, and are provided with swivels to adjust the jaws to the shape of the objects to be held in them. Vises are made of wood or metal, of many shapes, and supplied with many convenient attachments. They receive various names, descriptive of their use or method of construction, as bench-vise, saw-vise, sudden-grasp vise, parallel vise, pipe-vise.

4. A tool for drawing rods of lead into the grooved rods called comes used for setting glass, especially in stained-glass windows.—5t. A grip or grasp.

visible (viz'ib'l, v. and a. [< ME. visibyl, < OF. visibilis, < L. visibilis = F. visible = It. visibile].) 1. That may be seen; capable of being seen; open to sight.

Then the eighteth bone borne of Melusin,
Three eyes hanging on in front visible;
Which forth he gazed and won't let them in
From a Port-curtain. Ch. I. Sat. 1260

Well, and if I find where ever a speck of war is visible in our horizon, we never should have been without it. Johnson, Works, VIII. 69.

2. Apparently open; conspicuous; as, a man with no visible means of support.

Heav'n his actions were not visible.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 4. 152.

The factions at court were greater, or more visible, than before. Clarke, ed.

3. In vision, noting parts which are not concealed by other parts, as the spiracles when they are not concealed under the hard parts of the body. 4. Visible, opposed to concealed. Visible (char. h. h. 2), the church of Christ on the earth; the whole body of professed believers in Christ.—Visible horizon, the line that bounds the sight. See horizon.—Visible means, means of resources which are apparent or visible to others, so that the court or creditor can ascertain that the person is responsible or reach his property. Visible spectrum. See spectrum. 5. Visible speech, a name applied by Prof. A. Melville Bell, in 1869, to a system of alphabetical characters designed to represent every possible articulate utterance of the organs of speech. The system is based on a penetrating analysis of the possible actions of the speech-organs, each organ and every mode of action having its appropriate symbol. = Syn. Discernible, in sight, obvious, manifest, clear, distinct, evident, plain, patent, unmistakable.

II. n. That which is seen by the eye.

Visibles work upon a looking-glass, which is like the pupil of the eye.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 263.

Go into thy room and enter into that spiritual communion which is beyond all visibles.
A. E. Barr, Friend Olivia, iii.

visibleness (viz'i-bl-nes), n. The state or property of being visible; visibility.

visibly (viz'i-bl), adv. In a visible manner; perceptibly to the eye; manifestly; obviously; clearly.

visie, vizie (viz'i), n. [Also vizy; < F. visée, aim, < esser, aim, sight at: see rise.] 1. A scrutinizing view or look.

Ye had best take a visie of him through the wicket before opening the gate.
Scott.

2. The aim taken at an object, as when one is about to shoot.

Logan took a vizy and fired, but his gun flashed in the pan.
Guth, Steam-Boat, p. 143. (Jamieson.)

3. The knob or sight on the muzzle of a gun by which aim is taken. [Scotch in all uses.]

visiert, n. See vizit.

Visigoth (viz'i-goth), n. [*< LL. *Visigothi, Visigotha, West Goths, < visi-, rise-, repr. Teut. west, + Goth, Gotha, Goths.*] An individual of the more westerly of the two great historical divisions of the Goths. See Goth. The Visigoths founded a monarchy which continued in southern France until 476, and in Spain until 711. Also called West Goth.

Visigothic (viz-i-goth'ik), a. [< Visigoth + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Visigoths.

vision (vizh'on), n. [*< ME. vision, visionn, vision, < OF. vision, F. vision = Sp. vision = Pg. visão = It. visione, < L. visio(n-), the act or sense of seeing, vision, < videre, pp. visus, see, = Gr. idiv (*Fidiv), Skt. √ vid, know, = E. wit: see wit.* From the L. videre are also ult. The act of seeing external objects; sight.

Faith here is turned into vision there.

2. The faculty that perceives the luminosity, color, form, and relative size of objects; that sense whose organ is the eye; by extension, an analogous mental power. As noting one of the five special senses of the body, vision is correlated with olfaction, audition, gustation, and tactition. See sight.—3. That which is seen; an object of sight; specifically, a supernatural or prophetic appearance; something seen in a dream, ecstasy, trance, or the like; also, an apparition; a phantom.

There duelled the Holy Prophete Daniel; and there he saughe Visiounes of Bevene. Mandeville, Travels, p. 43.

Ye shall see all these dreams, your young men shall see visions.
Joel ii. 28.

Departing Year! 'twas on no earthly shore

My soul beheld thy vision!

Coleridge, Ode to the Departing Year, iv.

Far in the North, like a vision of sorrow,

Rise the white snow-drifts to topple and fall.

K. T. Cooke, September.

See axis.—Beatific vision, in theol. See beatific.—Binocular vision, vision effected by the cooperation of both eyes in such a way that the two impressions made upon the retina are perceived as one; stereoscopic vision. It is by means chiefly of binocular vision that we are enabled to judge of the relative positions of objects.—Center of vision. Same as point of vision.—Chromatic vision, a condition of sight in which objects appear to have a color they do not possess, or to have an iridescent border; chromatopsia. Day-vision, a condition of sight in which vision is weakened or lost at night; night-blindness; hemeralopia.—Dichromatic vision, a form of color-blindness in which there is perception of but two of the primary colors; dichromism. In this condition the perception of red is usually wanting.—Direct or central vision, the formation of the sight-image at the macula lutea. Direct-vision spectroscopy. See spectroscopy.—Double vision, the perception of two images of one and the same object; diplopia. Erect vision. See erect.—Field of vision. See field.—Indirect or peripheral vision, formation of the sight-image at some part of the retina other than the macula lutea.—Intuitive vision. Same as beatific vision. Iridescent vision, a condition of sight in which objects appear to be bordered with alternating colors like those of the rainbow; a form of chromatopsia.—Limit of distinct vision. See limit.—Night-vision, a condition of vision in which objects are perceived more clearly at night; day-blindness; nyctalopia.—Persistence of vision. See persistence.—Point of vision. See point.—Reflected vision, reflex vision. See reflex.—Refracted vision, vision performed by means of rays refracted or deviated by passing through mediums of different densities.

vision (vizh'on), v. t. [< vision, n.] 1. To see as in a vision; perceive by the eye of the intellect or imagination.

We in the morning eyed the pleasant fields

Visi'on'd before. Southey, Joan of Arc, viii.

Such guessing, visioning, dim perscrutation of the momentous future!

Carlyle, Past and Present, ii. 8. (Davies.)

2. To present in or as in a vision.

It [truth] may be visioned objectively by representatives and symbols, when the prophet becomes a seer, . . . visioned as out of the mind, . . . now as actual visioned and flowing clear.

E. H. Sears, The Fourth Gospel, The Heart of Christ, pp. 72, 80.

visional (vizh'on-al), a. [< vision + -al.] Of or pertaining to a vision; seen in a vision; hence, not real. Waterland.

Trapp, On Rev. xi. 14, quoted in Biblical Museum, V.

visionariness (vizh'on-ā-ri-nes), n. The character of being visionary.

Dulness from absolute monotony, and visionariness from the aerial texture of the speculations.

De Quincey, Style, iii.

visionary (vizh'on-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. visionnaire = Sp. Pg. It. visionario; as vision + -ary.] 1. a. 1. Apt to behold visions; of powerful and foreseeing imagination; imaginative; in a bad sense, apt to receive and act on mere fancies or whims as if they were realities; given to indulging in day-dreams, reveries, fanciful theories, or the like.

No more these scenes my meditation aid,

Or lull to rest the visionary mind.

Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 162.

The Sonnet glittered a gay myrtle-leaf

Amid the cypress with which Dante crowned

His visionary brow.

Wordsworth, Misc. Sonnets, ii. 1.

2. Of or pertaining to visions; of the nature of a vision or a product of the imagination; imaginary; in a bad sense, having no real basis; not founded on fact or possibility; impracticable; impossible: as, a visionary scheme.

Some things like visionary flights appear;

The spirit caught him up, the Lord knows where.

Dryden, Abs. and Achit., l. 656.

O Sleep, why dost thou leave me?

Why thy visionary joys remove?

Congreve, Semele, ii. 2.

Men come into business at first with visionary principles. Johnson, To Madison (Correspondence, II. 325).

That the project of peace should appear visionary to great numbers of sensible men . . . is very natural.

Emerson, War.

Her day-dreams truth, and truth a dream.

Scott, Rokeby, i. 30.

Aristophanes, so much of a scoffer and so little of a visionary. Lander, Imag. Conv., Lucian and Timotheus.

2. One who forms impracticable schemes; one who is given to idle and fanciful projects.

Some celebrated writers of our country, who, with all their good sense and genius, were visionaries on the subject of education. V. Knox, Grammar Schools.

=Syn. Dreamer, enthusiast.

visioned (vizh'ond), a. [< vision + -ed]. 1. Having the power of seeing visions; hence, inspired. [Rare.]

Oh! not the visioned poet in his dreams . . .

So bright, so fair, so wild a shape Hath yet beheld. Shelley, Queen Mab, i.

2. Seen in a vision; formed by the fancy, or in a dream, trance, or the like; produced by a vision; spectral.

My vision'd sight might yet prove true.

Scott, L. of the L., iv. 11.

The dream
Of dark magician in his visioned cave.

Shelley, Alastor.

She moves through fancy's visioned space.

Lovell, Fact or Fancy?

visionist (vizh'on-ist), n. [< vision + -ist]. One who sees, or believes that he sees, visions; a believer in visions; a visionary person.

We are so far from attaining any certain and real knowledge of incorporeal beings (of an acquaintance with which these visionists so much boast) that we are not able to know anything of corporeal substances as abstract from their accidents. Bp. Parker, Platonick Philos., p. 66.

The visionist has deeper thoughts and more concealed feelings than these rhapsodical phantoms.

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 215.

visionless (vizh'on-less), a. [< vision + -less]. Destitute of vision; sightless; blind.

visit (viz'it), v. [< ME. visiten, < OF. (and F.) visiter = Sp. Pg. visitar = It. visitare, < L. visitare, see, go to see, visit, punish, freq. of visere, look at attentively, behold, < videre, pp. visus, see: see vision.] I. trans. 1. To go or come to see (a person or thing) in the way of friendship, business, curiosity, ceremony, or duty; call upon; proceed to in order to view or look on.

And by the way we vnysted some holy places.

Sir R. Guyfforde, Pilgrimage, p. 18.

At Lyons I visited the Reliques at the yle wher Sent Anne lyes and longious.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 2.

I'm come to take my last farewell,

And pay my last visit to thee.

Young Hunting (Child's Ballads, III. 295).

I'd sooner be visited by the Plague; for that only would keep a man from Visits, and his Doors shut.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, i. 1.

Visits

Like those of angels, short and far between.

Blair, The Grave, ii. 589.

2. A formal or official call; a visitation.

Periodical visits were made by vassals to their suzerains, and by these to their higher suzerains—the kings.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 379.

Domiciliary visit. See domiciliary. — Right of visit. Same as right of visitation. See visitation. — Visit to the Blessed Sacrament. In Rom. Cath. usage, a daily visit to a church in order to engage in silent prayer before the sacrament: a practice common in religious houses.

visitable (viz'i-tā-ble), a. [< visit + -able]. Liable or subject to be visited or inspected; admitting of visitation or inspection.

The next morning we set out again, in order to see the Sanctuaries and other visitable places upon Mount Olivet.

Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 104.

All hospitals built since the reformation are visitable by the king or lord chancellor.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

visitant (viz'i-tant), a. and n. [< L. visitant(-t)s, ppr. of visitare, see: see visit]. I. a. Acting the part of a visitor; paying visits; visiting.

He knew the rocks which Angels haunt

Upon the mountains visitant.

Wordsworth, Song at Feast of Brougham Castle.

II. n. 1. One who visits; one who goes or comes to see another; one who is a guest in the house of a friend; a visitor.

That in sweet numbers court your goodly virtues.

Fletcher, Wife for a Month, i. 2.

He has a rich wrought waistcoat to entertain his visitants in.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

The intellectual character of her extreme beauty, . . . and her unbounded benevolence, gave more the idea of an angelic visitant than of a being belonging to this nether world.

Scott, L. of L. M. (ed. 1830), Int.

His heart,

Where Fear sat thus, a cherished visitant.

Wordsworth, Excursion, i.

2. In ornith., a migratory bird which comes to and stays in a place or region during a part of the year: opposed to resident: as, the snowy owl is a winter visitant from the north in the United States. Rare or irregular visitants are termed stragglers. See straggler, 2.—3. [cap.] A member of a Roman Catholic order of nuns, founded at Annecy in Savoy by Francis de Sales and Mme. de Chantal in 1610. The order spread in various countries, and has been efficient in the education of young girls. The Visitants are also called Salesians, Order of the Visitation, Nuns of the Visitation, etc.

visitation (viz-i-tā'shon), n. [< ME. visitacioun, < OF. (and F.) visitation = Sp. visitacion = Pg. visitaçao = It. visitazione, < LL. visitatio(-n-), a sight, appearance, visitation, punishment, < L. visitare, visit: see visit]. 1. The act of visiting, or paying a visit; a visit.

Therefore I made my visitaciouns

To vigillies and to processiouns.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 555.

The king of Sicilia means to pay Bohemia the visitation which he justly owes him.

Shak., W. T., i. 1. 7.

When a woman is delivered of a child, the man lyeth in, and keepeth his bed, with visitation of Gossips, the space of fortie dayes.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 429.

2. The object of a visit. [Rare.]

O flowers, . . .

My early visitation, and my last.

Milton, P. L., xi. 275.

3. A formal or judicial visit paid periodically by a superior, superintending officer, or other competent authority, to a corporation, college, church, or other house, for the purpose of examining into the manner in which the business of the body is conducted, and its laws and regulations are observed and executed, or the like; specifically (eccles.), such examination, by a bishop of the churches in his diocese, with the added purpose of administering confirmation. The right of visitation attaches to metropolitans in their provinces, to bishops in their dioceses, and to archdeacons in certain cases.

The magistrates shall be more familiar and open each to other, and more frequent in visitations, and shall, in tenderness and love, admonish one another.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 213.

4. A special dispensation from heaven, sometimes of divine favor, more usually of divine retribution; divine retributive affliction; hence, a similar incident of less importance, whether joyful or grievous.

We see that the most comfortable visitations which God hath sent men from above have taken especially the times of prayer as their most natural opportunities.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 23.

What will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far?

Isa. x. 3.

These were bright visitations in a scholar's and a clerk's life.

Lamb, Oxford in the Vacation.

5. In international law, the act of a naval commander who visits or boards a vessel belonging to another state for the purpose of ascertaining her character and object. It does not include the claim or exercise of the right of search. The right of performing this act is called the right of visit or visitation.

6. [cap.] A church festival in honor of the visit of the Virgin Mary to her cousin Elizabeth (Luke i. 39), celebrated on July 2d in the Roman Catholic, Greek, and other churches.

7. In zool., an extensive, irregular, or otherwise notable migration into a place or country; an irruption, incursion, or invasion: as, a visitation of lemmings, of the Bohemian wax-wing southward, or of the sand-grouse from Asia into France or England.—8. In her., an investigation by a high heraldic officer, usually one of the kings-at-arms, into the pedigrees, intermarriages, etc., of a family or the families of a district, with a view of ascertaining whether the arms borne by any person or persons living in that district are incorrect or unwarrantably assumed. The king-at-arms was accompanied on such occasions by secretaries, draftsman, etc.

The latest visitation on record in England seems to have been between the years 1686 and 1700; but before that time they had ceased to be regularly held.—Nuns of the Visitation, Order of the Visitation. See visitant, 3.—Visitation of the sick, an office of the Anglican church, appointed to be used for the spiritual benefit of sick persons. Provision is made in the English Prayer-book for special confession and absolution of the sick person, while the American Prayer-book merely provides that the minister shall examine whether he repeat him truly of his sins.

visitatorial (viz'i-tā-tō-ri-āl), a. [< LL. visitator, a visitor (< L. visitare, see), + -i-āl]. Belonging or pertaining to a judicial visitor or visitation: as, visitatorial power; hence, pertaining to any authorized inspector or examination: as, a health officer's visitatorial work or authority. Also visitorial.

The enactment by which Elizabeth and her successors had been empowered to appoint commissioners with visitatorial authority over the Church was not only not revived, but was declared, with the utmost strength of language, to be completely abrogated.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

visit-day (viz'it-dā), n. A day on which callers are received.

On visit-days she bears

To mount her fifty flights of ample stairs.

Young, Night Thoughts, vi. 506.

A knowledge of the law and a devotion to its principles are vital to a republic, and lie at the very foundation of its strength. Story, Misc. Writings, p. 512.

5+. Capable of living; viable.

Pythagoras, Hippocrates, . . . and others . . . affirming the birth of the seventh month to be vital.

See T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

Vital air, an old name for oxygen gas, which is essential to animal life.—Vital capacity of the lungs. See capacities. Vital center. Same as center of respiration (which see, under respiration).—Vital Christianity. See Christianity, 1 (c).—Vital congruity, the mode of union of body and soul according to the English Platonists.—Vital contractility, the power of contraction inherent in living muscular tissue.—Vital fluid, the name given by Schultze to a fluid in plants, found in certain vessels called by him vital vessels. It is also termed inter.—Vital force, the animating force in animals and plants. See the first quotation under vitality.—Vital functions. See function.—Vital-germ theory of contagion, the theory that contagious diseases are due to the presence of perverted bioplasms which are descended from others originally healthy.—Vital power, the ability to live, or continue alive; vitality.

The movement of the bioplasm is vital, occurs only during life, and is due to vital power—which vital power of this, the highest form of bioplasm in nature, is in fact the living I. Beale, Bioplasm, p. 209.

Vital principle, that principle upon which, when united with organized matter, the phenomena of life are supposed to depend. See vitality.—Vital sense, cnesthesis.—Vital tripod. See tripod.

Vitalisation, vitalise, etc. See vitalization, etc. vitalism (vī'tal-izm), n. [< vital + -ism.] In biol., the doctrine that ascribes all the functions of an organism to a vital principle distinct from chemical and other physical forces.

vitalist (vī'tal-ist), n. [= F. vitaliste; < vital + -ist.] A believer in the existence of vital force as distinguished from the other forces operative upon animal and vegetable organisms. vitalistic (vī-tā-lis'tik), a. [< vitalist + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or involving the theory of vitalism. Helmholtz, Popular Sci. Lectures (trans.), p. 383.—2. Noting the vital-germ theory of contagion (which see, under vital).

It was no easy thing for him to justify the study of fermentation on the lines suggested by what was called the vitalistic or germ theory. Nature, XLIII. 482.

vitality (vī-tal'i-ti), n. [< F. vitalité = Sp. vitalidad = Pg. vitalidade = It. vitalità, < L. vitalitas (t-s), vital force, life, < vitalis, vital; see vital.] 1. The exhibiting of vital powers or capacities; the principle of animation or of life; vital force. See life.

It may be convenient to use the terms "vitality" and "vital force" to denote the causes of certain great groups of natural operations, as we employ the names of "electricity" and "electrical force" to denote others; but it ceases to be proper to do so if such a name implies the absurd assumption that either "electricity" or "vitality" is an entity playing the part of an efficient cause of electrical or vital phenomena. A mass of living protoplasm is simply a molecular machine of great complexity, the total results of the working of which, or its vital phenomena, depend on the one hand upon its construction, and on the other upon the energy supplied to it; and to speak of vitality as anything but the name of a series of operations is as if one should talk of the "horology" of a clock. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 15.

Undoubtedly a man of genius can out of his own superabundant vitality compel life into the most decrepit vocabulary. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 240.

2. Manifestation of a capacity for enduring and performing certain functions: as, an institution devoid of vitality.

No incredulity or neglect can destroy the innate vitality of truth. Gettys, Geol. Sketches, ii. 30.

There is nothing more curious than the vitality of a class of words never employed in good society, and never admitted into any dictionary. Science, V. 380.

vitalization (vī'tal-i-zā'shon), n. [< vitalize + -ation.] The act or process of infusing the vital principle. Also spelled vitalisation.

The essential function of the male element is not the vitalization of the germ. W. K. Brooks, Law of Heredity, p. 248.

vitalize (vī'tal-iz), v. t.: pret. and pp. vitalized, ppr. vitalizing. [< vital + -ize.] To give life to; render living; give an organic or vital character to. Also spelled vitalise.

It appears that it [organic assimilation] is a force which not only produces motion and chemical change, but also vitalizes the matter on which it acts. Whewell, Hist. Scientific Ideas, iv. § 3.

It is thought to go without the saying that the [Austrian] monarch's negative will absolutely kill, his "let it be" abundantly vitalize, all laws, whether constitutional or other. W. Wilson, State, § 596.

vitalizer (vī'tal-i-zēr), n. [< vitalize + -er.] One who or that which vitalizes. Also spelled vitaliser.

vitaly (vī'tal-li), adv. 1. In a vital manner; so as to give life.

The organic structure of human bodies, whereby they are fitted to live and move, and be vitaly informed by the soul, is the workmanship of a most wise, powerful, and beneficent Maker. Bentley, (Johnson.)

2. In a manner or degree essential to continued existence; essentially: as, vitaly important.

His attainment to a knowledge of God and this instant resistance of Sin are most intimately and vitaly related. Neither can advance beyond the other. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 95.

3. In the vitals; as affecting vital parts; mortally; fatally: as, the animal was vitaly hit or hurt.

vitals (vī'talz), n. pl. [Pl. of vital; short for vital parts.] 1. The viscera necessary for vital processes; those interior parts or organs which are essential to life, as the brain, heart, lungs, and stomach: a vague general term.

A slight wound; Though it pierce'd his body, it hath miss'd the vitals. Fletcher (and another), Fair Maid of the Inn, ii. 1.

2. The part of any complex whole that is essential to its life or existence, or to a sound state: as, corruption of manners preys upon the vitals of a state.

A mortal disease was upon her vitals before Caesar had crossed the Rubicon. Story, Speech, Salem, Sept. 18, 1828.

vitativeness (vī-tā'tiv-nes), n. In phren., the love of life—a faculty assigned to a protuberance under the ear; also, the organ which is supposed to indicate the presence of this faculty.

vitellarian (vit-e-lā'ri-an), a. [< vitellarium + -an.] Of or pertaining to the vitellarium: as, the vitellarian ducts. See cuts under germarium, Trematoda, and Cestoidea. Huxley.

vitellarium (vit-e-lā'ri-um), n.; pl. vitellaria (-i). [NL. < L. vitellus, yolk; see vitellus.] A special gland of the female generative apparatus of some worms, additional to the germarium, in which gland an accessory vitelline substance is formed. See germarium, and cuts under Trematoda and Rhabdocela.

vitellary (vit'e-lā-ri), n. and a. [< L. vitellus, yolk; see vitellus.] 1. n. The place where the yolk of an egg swims in the white.

The vitellary or place of the yolk is very high. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 28.

II. a. Same as vitelline.

The vitellary sac of the embryo. Huxley.

vitellicle (vit-el'i-kl), n. [*< NL. *vitellculus, dim. of vitellus, yolk; see vitellus.*] A yolk-sac; the vitelline or vitellary vesicle; the bag which hangs out of the belly of an embryo, in the higher animals called the umbilical vesicle. See cuts under embryo and uterus.

vitelligenous (vit-e-lī'j'e-nus), a. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + -genus, producing; see -genous.] Producing yolk or vitellus: specifying those cells secreted by the ovarioles of certain insects, which are supposed to supply nutriment to the ova. Also vitellogenous. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 381.

vitellin (vi-tel'in), n. [< vitell(us) + -in.] The chief proteid constituent of the yolk of eggs. It is a white granular body insoluble in water, soluble in dilute salt solutions, and not precipitated by saturation with salt. It is associated with lecithin, and probably combined with it in the yolk of the egg.

vitelline (vi-tel'in), a. and n. [< vitellus + -ine.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the vitellus, or yolk of an egg; forming a vitellus, as protoplasm: said especially of the large mass of food-yolk or deutoplasm of a meroblastic egg, or of the vitellicle.—2. In entom. and bot., colored like the yolk of an egg; deep-yellow with a tinge of red.

Also vitellary.

Vitelline duct. See ductus vitellinus, under ductus, and cut under embryo.—Vitelline membrane. See membrane.—Vitelline sac, the vitellicle, or umbilical vesicle.

II. n. Yolk; the vitellus; the vitellary substance. See I., 1. [Rare.]

vitellogene (vī-tel'ō-jēn), n. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + -genus, producing.] The vitellarium. vitellogenous (vit-e-loj'e-nus), a. Same as vitellogenous.

vitellolutein (vi-tel'ō-lū'tē-in), n. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + luteus, golden-yellow, + -in.] A yellow coloring matter found in the eggs of the spider-crab, Maia squinado.

vitellorubin (vi-tel'ō-rō-bin), n. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + rub(er), red, + -in.] A reddish-brown coloring matter found in the eggs of Maia squinado.

vitellus (vi-tel'us), n. [NL. < L. vitellus, a yolk, a transferred use of vitellus, a little calf, dim. of vitulus, a calf; see veal.] The yolk of an egg; in the broadest sense, the protoplasm of an ovum; the germinative or formative protoplasmic contents of an ovum-cell, which is transformed into the body of the embryo, plus that substance, if any, which nourishes the embryo during its germination and subsequent growth. Hence, in meroblastic ova, two kinds of vitellus are distinguished, the germ-yolk, or germinative vitellus proper, and the food yolk, the former forming and the latter nourishing the embryo.—Segmentation of the vitellus. See segmentation.—Vitellus formativus, formative or true yolk. See morphoecithus.—Vitellus nutritivus, food-yolk. See traphoeceithus.

Vitex (vī'teks), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690), < L. viter, agnus castus.] A genus of plants, of the order Verbenaceæ, type of the tribe Viticeæ. It is characterized by medium-sized flowers, the corolla with a short tube and very oblique five-cleft or two-lipped limb (its forward lobe larger), by four usually exserted stamens, and by a drupaceous fruit with a single four-celled nutlet. There are about 75 species, widely dispersed throughout warm regions, a few extending into temperate parts of Asia and southern Europe. They are trees or shrubs bearing opposite leaves, which are commonly composed of three to seven digitate entire or toothed thin or coriaceous leaflets. The flowers are white, blue, violet, or yellowish, and form cymes which are loose and widely forking, or short, dense, and sometimes almost contracted into a head. The genus is somewhat aromatic; several species are tender shrubs cultivated under glass. V. agnus castus, a deciduous shrub from Sicily and the Mediterranean, is cultivated in many forms, as with variegated leaves, etc., under the names chastetree, Abraham's-balm, hemp-tree, monk's pepper-tree, and especially agnus castus (which see, under agnus). V. trifolia is known in India as wild pepper. V. pubescens (V. arborea) of the East Indies is an evergreen reaching 50 feet in height, known as tree-vitex. Many species produce a valuable wood, as V. lignum-vitæ, the lignum-vitæ of Queensland, and V. capitata, the bois lèzard of Trinidad, Guiana, and Brazil, or a durable building-timber, especially V. littoralis, the New Zealand teak or puriri, which is considered indestructible in water. The last is a large tree sometimes 5 feet in diameter, bearing spreading branches of dull red hairy flowers an inch long. (See puriri, and New Zealand teak (under teak).) V. umbrosa of the West Indies is one of the trees known as boxwood or fiddlewood.

Flowering Plant of Vitex agnus-castus, a, a flower.

vital (vī'sh'āl), a. [< L. vitium, a fault, vice, + -al.] Faulty; corrupt; vicious.

There is nothing on it [the earth] that is of it which is not become more vital than vital. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 357.

vitiare (vish'i-āt), v. t.: pret. and pp. vitiated, ppr. vitiating. [Formerly also viciare; < L. viciatus, pp. of viciare (> It. viciare = Sp. Pg. viciar = F. vicier), make faulty, injure, spoil, corrupt, < vitium, a fault, imperfection: see vici.] 1. To render vicious, faulty, or imperfect; injure the quality or substance of; cause to be defective; impair; spoil; corrupt: as, a vitiating taste.

This heauteous Maid [Venice] hath been often attempted to be viciated. Howell, Letters, I. 1. 20.

Wholesome meats to a vitiating stomach differ little or nothing from unwholesome. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 16.

2. To cause to fail of effect, either in whole or in part; render invalid or of no effect; destroy the validity or binding force of, as of a legal instrument or a transaction; divest of legal value or authority; invalidate: as, any undue influence exerted on a jury vitiates their verdict; fraud vitiates a contract; a court is vitiating by the presence of unqualified persons sitting as members of it.

The least defect of self-possession vitiates, in my judgment, the entire relation [friendship]. Emerson, Friendship.

=Syn. 1. Pollute, Corrupt, etc. (see taint), debase, deprave.

vitiatio (vish-i-ā'shon), n. [< L. vitiatio(n), violation, corruption, < vitiare, corrupt, vitiare: see vitiare.] The act of vitiating. Specifically—(a) Impairment; corruption: as, vitiatio of the blood.

The strong vitiatio of the German idiom with English words and expressions. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 315.

(b) A rendering invalid or illegal: as, the vitiatio of a contract or a court.

vitiator (vish'i-ā-tor), n. [< L. vitiator, < vitiare, corrupt, vitiare: see vitiare.] One who or that which vitiates.

vitrescence (vi-tres'ens), n. [< vitrescen(t) + -ce.] The state of becoming glassy, or of growing to resemble glass.

vitrescent (vi-tres'ent), a. [< L. vitrum, glass, + -escent.] Turning into glass; tending to become glass.

vitrescible (vi-tres'i-bl), a. [= F. vitrescible; as vitrescent + -able.] Capable of becoming glassy, or of being turned into glass.

vitrum (vit'rē-um), n.: pl. vitra (-i). [NL., neut. of L. vitreus, glassy; see vitreous.] The corpus vitreum, vitreous body, or vitreous humor of the eye. See cut under eye.

vitric (vit'rik), a. [< L. vitrum, glass, + -ic.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, glass or any vitreous material.

vitrics (vit'riks), n. [Pl. of vitric; see -ics.] 1. Glass and glassy materials in general.—2. The study or history of glass and glass-manufacture. Compare ceramics.

vitriification (vit-ri-fak'shən), n. [< L. vitrum, glass, + facere, pp. factus, make, do; see fact-.] 1. The art or operation of turning into glass.—2. The act or process of becoming glass.

vitriification (vit-ri-fak'tūr), n. [< L. vitrum, glass, + factura, a making; see facture.] The manufacture of glass.

vitriifiability (vit-ri-fi-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< vitriifiable + -ity (see -bility).] The property of being vitriifiable.

vitriifiable (vit-ri-fi-a-bl), a. [< F. vitrifiable; as vitriify + -able.] Capable of being vitrified or converted into glass by heat and fusion; as, flint and alkalis are vitriifiable.—Vitriifiable colors. See color.

vitriifiable (vit-rif'i-ka-bl), a. [< vitrific(ate) + -able.] Same as vitriifiable. [Rare.]

vitriificate (vit-ri-fi-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitriificated, ppr. vitriificating. [*< NL. *vitriificatus*, pp. of **vitriificare*, vitrify; see vitriify.] To vitrify. [Rare.]

vitriification (vit-ri-fi-kā'shən), n. [< F. vitriification = Sp. vitrificacion = Pg. vitrificacão = It. vitrificazione; as vitrificate + -ion.] Conversion into glass, or in general into a material having a glassy or vitreous structure. Some minerals and most rocks, when fused, are converted into a more or less perfect glass, or become vitrified. This is the case when the melted material cools rapidly; but if cooled slowly more or less complete devitrification takes place, and a lithoid structure is the result. See devitrification.

vitriified (vit-ri-fid), p. a. Converted into glass; hence, by extension, partially converted into glass, as having the exterior converted into a glaze, or having the substance hard and glassy from exposure to heat; as, vitriified tiles.—Vitriified fort or wall, one of a type of early native defensive structures found in Scotland, France, etc., in which heavy walls of silicious stone have been exposed to fire, with the result that they have become to some extent vitrified. There has been much discussion as to whether this is an accidental result of the burning of wooden superstructures or of later structures built against the walls, or whether it is an effect sought purposely by the builders with the view of making the walls more solid. See vitriification.

vitriiform (vit-ri-fōrm), a. [< L. vitrum, glass, + forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of glass; vitreous in appearance.

vitriify (vit-ri-fi), v.; pret. and pp. vitriified, ppr. vitriifying. [< F. vitrifier = Sp. Pg. vitrificar = It. vitrificare, *< NL. *vitriificare*, < L. vitrum, glass, + -ficare, < facere, make, do (see -fy).] 1. trans. To convert into glass by the action of heat. See glass.

II. intrans. To become glass; be converted into glass.

Chymists make vessels of animal substances calcin'd, which will not vitriify in the fire.

Arbuthnot, Aliments, iv. § 1.

Vitrina (vi-trī'nā), n. [NL. (Drapiez, 1801), < L. vitrum, glass; see vitreous.] 1. The typical genus of Vitridae, having a very thin, delicate, and transparent shell; glass-snails, as V. pellucida, V. limpida, etc.—2. [l. c.] A glass-snail of this genus.

vitrine (vit'rin), n. [< F. vitrine, < vitre, window-glass, < L. vitrum, glass.] A show-case; a case or inclosure of glass for the display of delicate articles, whether in a museum, a private house, or a shop.

Many caskets and vases are in upright vitrines standing on the floor, while numerous larger works are in wall cases. Athenæum, No. 3207, p. 480.

Vitridae (vi-trin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vitrina + -idae.] A family of monotrematous geophilous pulmoniferous gastropods, typified by the genus Vitrina; the glass-snails. They have the shell heliciform, very thin, too small to contain the animal, and of a few rapidly enlarging whorls; the jaw rib-less and smooth or striate, the teeth differentiated into a median tricuspid one, lateral ones bicuspid or tricuspid, and marginal ones aculeate, unicuspid, or bicuspid. The species are numerous. Also Vitridinae, as a subfamily of Lamniculæ or of Helicidae.

vitrioid (vit-ri-oid), a. [< Vitrina + -oid.] Like a glass-snail; resembling the Vitridae, or related to them.

Helicarian has a vitrioid shell.

P. P. Carpenter, Lect. on Mollusca (1861), p. 79.

vitriol (vit-ri-ol), n. [Formerly also vitrioll; < ME. vitriol, vitriole, < OF. (and F.) vitriol = Sp. Pg. It. vitriolo = D. vitriool = G. Sw. Dan. vitriol, < ML. vitriolum, vitriol, neut. of vitriolus, var. of LL. vitreolus, of glass, glass, dim. of L. vitreus, of glass; see vitreous.] Sulphuric acid, or one of many of its compounds, which in certain states have a glassy appearance.

Cered pokets, sal peter, vitriole.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 255.

Blue vitriol, copper vitriol, hydrous copper sulphate. When found in nature, it is called chalcantide or cyanusite.—Elxir of vitriol. See elixir.—Green vitriol. Same as copperas; in mineral, the species melanterite.—Lead vitriol. Same as anglesite.—Nickel vitriol, hydrated nickel sulphate; in mineral, the species morenosite.—Oil of vitriol, concentrated sulphuric acid.—Red iron vitriol, in mineral, same as betrygen.—Red vitriol. (a) A sulphate of cobalt; in mineral, the species bieberite. Also called cobalt-vitriol. (b) Ferric sulphate; same as cothar. Also called vitriol of Mars.—Roman vitriol, copper sulphate, or blue vitriol.—Salt of vitriol, zinc sulphate.—White or zinc vitriol, hydrated zinc sulphate; in mineral, the species goslarite.

vitriolate (vit-ri-ō-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitriolated, ppr. vitriolating. [< vitriol + -ate.] To convert into a vitriol, as iron pyrites by the absorption of oxygen, which reduces the iron to an oxid, and the sulphur to sulphuric acid. Thus, the sulphid of iron when vitriolated becomes sulphate of iron, or green vitriol. Also vitriolize.

vitriolate (vit-ri-ō-lāt), a. [< vitriolate, v.] Converted into a vitriol or a sulphate.

vitriolation (vit-ri-ō-lā'shən), n. [< vitriolate + -ion.] The act or process of converting into a vitriol or a sulphate. Also vitriolization.

vitriolic (vit-ri-ō-lik), a. [= F. vitriolique = Sp. vitriolico = Pg. It. vitriolico; as vitriol + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to vitriol; having the properties of vitriol, or obtained from vitriol.

We were fain to have recourse to the rum, a horrid vitriolic beverage, which burned our throats and stomachs like melted lead. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 166.

2. Biting; caustic; very severe or censorious.

Sensitive to his vitriolic criticism.

O. W. Holmes, Account of the Composition of "The Last Leaf."

Vitriolic acid, an obsolete name for oil of vitriol, or sulphuric acid.—Vitriolic ether, sulphuric ether.

vitrioline (vit-ri-ō-lin), a. [< vitriol + -ine.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling vitriol; vitriolic.

A spring of a vitrioline taste and odour.

Fuller, Worthies, Yorkshire, III. 396.

The Air and Weather dissolving the Stones, the Rain falling upon them carries away with it the Vitrioline Juice or Salt dissolved. Ray, Eng. Words (ed. 1691), p. 198.

vitriolizable (vit-ri-ol-i-zā-bl), a. [< vitriolize + -able.] Capable of being converted into a vitriol.

vitriolization (vit-ri-ol-i-zā'shən), n. [= F. vitriolisation = Sp. vitriolización; as vitriolize + -ation.] Same as vitriolization.

vitriolize (vit-ri-ol-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitriolized, ppr. vitriolizing. [= Sp. vitriolizar; as vitriol + -ize.] 1. Same as vitriolate.—2. To poison or injure with vitriol.

The jury did not believe that the child from the same motive vitriolized himself.

Daily News (London), March 15, 1886. (Encyc. Dict.)

vitriolous (vit-ri-ol-us), a. [< vitriol + -ous.] Containing vitriol; vitriolic.

vitro-di-trina (vit-rō-di-trē'nā), n. [It. vitro, glass; di, of; trina, lace, galloon.] Lacework glass, especially that in which the white threads are crossed at an angle forming lozenge-shaped compartments, every one of which, in some specimens, contains a small air-bubble. Compare reticulated glass, under glass.

vitrophyre (vit-rō-fir), n. [< L. vitrum, glass, + (por)phyrites, porphyry.] The name given by Vogelsang to a subdivision of the porphyritic rocks in which the ground-mass consists exclusively of a glassy magma. See granophyre.

vitrophyric (vit-rō-fir'ik), a. [< vitrophyre + -ic.] Consisting of, or having the characters of, vitrophyre.

Among the pyroxenic rocks the most noticeable varieties are the labradorite-andesites, the pyroxene-andesites—of which both "trachtyoid" and "vitrophyric" forms occur. Philos. Mag., XXIX. 288.

Vitruvian (vi-trō'vi-an), a. [< L. Vitruvius (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Marcus Vitruvius Pollio, a Roman architect of the latter part of the first century B. C., the author of an important treatise on architecture, which, although its statements can be accepted only after careful criticism, preserves much that is valuable regarding Greek and Roman art.—Vitruvian scroll, an architectural ornament named after Vitruvius, consisting of a series of convoluted scrolls, of fanciful and varied effect. It frequently occurs in friezes of the Composite order.

vitry (vit'ri), n. A fine kind of canvas, for making paulins and powder-cloths. Farrow, Mil. Encey., I. 361.

vitta (vit'ā), n.; pl. vittæ (-ē). [NL., < L. vitta, a band, a fillet, < viere, bend or twist together, plait.] 1. A headband, fillet, or garland; specifically, among the ancient Greeks and Romans, a band or fillet used as a decoration of sacred persons or things, as of priests, victims, statues, and altars.—2. One of the infule or lappets of a miter.

—3. In bot., an oil-tube, or receptacle for oil, found in the fruits of most Umbelliferae. They are longitudinal canals or tubes filled with an aromatic or peculiar secretion. Their usual position is in the intervals between the ridges of the fruit, where they occur singly or in groups. Their number, size, position, etc., are of great systematic value. See oil-tube.

4. In zool., a band; a streak or stripe, as of color or texture; a fascia.

vittate (vit'at), a. [< L. vittatus, bound with a fillet, < vitta, a fillet; see vitta.] Provided with or having a vitta or vittæ; in bot., also, striped longitudinally.

vittlet, n. An obsolete spelling of vitreal.

vitular (vit'ū-lār), a. [< L. vitulus, a calf; see veal.] Of or pertaining to, or connected with, calves.—Vitular or vitulary apoplexy, apoplexy occurring in cows during parturition.—Vitular or vitulary fever. Same as vitular apoplexy.

vitulary (vit'ū-lā-ri), a. Same as vitular.

vituline (vit'ū-lin), a. [< L. vitulinus, of or pertaining to a calf or veal, < vitulus, a calf; see veal.] 1. Of or pertaining to a calf or veal.

If a double allowance of vituline brains deserve such honor [to be exhibited as a wonder as a double-headed calf], there are few commentators on Shakespeare that would have gone afoot.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 167.

2. Like a calf in some respect; as, the vituline seal, the common harbor-seal, Phoca vitulina.

vituperable (vi-tū'pe-rā-bl), a. [< ME. vituperable, < OF. vituperable = Sp. vituperable = Pg. vituperavel = It. vituperabile, < L. vituperabilis, blamable, < vituperare, blame; see vituperate.] Deserving of or liable to vituperation; censurable; blameworthy. Caxton.

vituperate (vi-tū'pe-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vituperated, ppr. vituperating. [< L. vituperatus, pp. of vituperare (> It. vituperare = Pg. vituperar = F. vitupérer), blame, censure, < vitium, fault, defect, + parare, furnish, provide, contrive.] To address abusive language to; find fault with abusively; abuse verbally; rate; oburgate.

The incensed priests . . . continued to raise their voices, vituperating each other in bad Latin.

Scott, Ivanhoe, xxxiii.

The Earl (Leicester) hated Norris more bitterly than before, and was perpetually vituperating him.

Molloy, Hist. Netherlands, II. 514.

= Syn. To revile, vilify, berate, upbraid, rail at. The person or creature vituperated is directly addressed.

vituperation (vi-tū'pe-rā'shən), n. [< OF. F. vituperation = Sp. vituperacion = Pg. vituperacão = It. vituperazione, < L. vituperatio(n)], blame, censure, < vituperare, blame; see vituperate.

Alre, . . . of all the Elements the most noble, and fullest of vivacity and liveliness.

Hierarchy of Angels, p. 156.

2†. Tenacity of life; hence, length of life; longevity.

Seeds of Barberry . . . in this county is most valuable for its tenacity, for he lived . . . 110 years.
Fuller, Worthles, Staffordshire, III. 140.

3. Liveliness of manner or character; spright-liness of temper or behavior; animation; life;
briskness; cheerfulness; spirit.

Heart and countenance image is an excellent composition for lascivious.
Bacon, Youth and Age.

It is remarkable that those who want any one sense possess the others with greater force and vivacity.

Steele, Spectator, No. 4.

Memory even in early childhood never functions alone;
it is or appears to be essentially connected with the vivacity of the perceptions and the exactitude of the judgments.
B. Ferri, quoted in Mind, XII. 284.

4. That which is vivacious; a vivacious act or sayings. [Rare.]

"Jacques Damour," . . . in spite of a few vivacities of speech, is a play with which the censure, to escape which is a principal object of the Theatre Libre, would not dream of meddling.
Athenaeum, No. 3198, p. 189.

Syn. 3. Life, Liveliness, etc. See animation.

vivandière (vi-von-di-är'), n. [F., fem. of vi-vander = Sp. vivandero = Pg. vivandero, < It. vivandura, a sutler, < vivanda, food: see vivand.] A woman attached to French and other continental regiments, who sells provisions and liquor. Vivandières still exist in the French army, but the uniform, which was generally a modified form of that of the regiment, has been abandoned by order.

vivarium (vi-vä'-ri-um), n.; pl. vivariums, viva-ria (-umz, -ä). [L. vivarium, an inclosure in which game, fish, etc., are kept alive, < vivus, living, alive, < vivere, live: see vivid.] A place where animals of any kind are kept alive in their natural state as far as possible; a vivary; a zoological park. A vivarium may be adapted to all kinds of animals; one for special purposes may be called by a particular name. A place for fish, etc., is an aquarium (of which the generic opposite is terrarium); for birds, an aviary; for frogs, a ronarium; for mollusks, a snailery, etc. A vivarium in popular language takes its name from the animals kept in it, as piggery, henery, etc.

There is also adjoining to it a vivarium for estriges, peacocks, swans, cranes, etc. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 17, 1644.

vivarium: see vivarium.] A vivarium. [Rare.]

The garden has every variety, hills, dales, rocks, grooves, vivaries, vivaries, fountains. Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 22, 1644.

That cage and vivary

Of fowls and beasts.

Donne, Progress of the Soul, iii.

vivat (vi-vat), n. [= F. vivat (as L.), also vive
= It. Sp. Pg. viva: < L. vivat, 3d pers. sing. pres.
subj. of vivere, live: see vivid.] (cf. viva, *vive*2.)
An exclamation of applause or joy; a viva.

Twenty-seven millions travelling on such courses, with gold jingling in every pocket, with vivats heaven high, are incessantly advancing . . . to the firm land's end.
Carlyle.

viva voce (vi-vä'-vo'se). [L., by or with the living voice: vivā, abl. sing. fem. of vivus, living;
voce, abl. sing. of vox, voice: see voice.] By word of mouth; orally. It is sometimes used attributively: as, a viva voce vote.

The king's attorney, on the contrary,
Urg'd on the examinations, proofs, confessions
Of divers witnesses; which the duke desired
To have brought viva voce to his face.

Shak., Hen. VIII, ii. 1. 18.

Nothing can equal a viva-voce examination for trying a candidate's knowledge in the contents of a long history or philosophical treatise.
The Nation, XLVIII. 306.

vivda, n. See vifda.

vive1 (viv), a. [F. vif, fem. vive, lively, quick, < L. vivus, alive, < vivere, live: see vivid.] 1†. Lively; vivid; vivacious; forcible. Bacon, War with Spain.

Not that I am able to express by words, or utter by eloquence, the vive image of my own inward thankfulness.
Wilson's James I. (Nares.)

2. Bright; clear; distinct. [Scotch.]

vive2 (vêv), interj. [F. (= It. viva), 3d pers.
sing. impv. of vivre, live: see viva, vivat.] Long live: as, vive le roi, long live the king; vive la bonaparte, success to trilles or sport.

vively (viv'li), adv. [cf. *vive*1 + *-ly*2.] In a vivid or lively manner.

Where statues and Joves acts were vively limn'd.

Marston, Sophonisba, iv. 1.

A thing vively presented on the stage.

B. Jonson, Magnificent Lady, ii. 1.

vivency (vi-ven-si), n. [L. vivencia (-s), pp. of vivere, live, + -cy.] Manner of living.

Although not in a distinct and indisputable way of vi-vency.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

viveret, n. [ME., < OF. vivier, < L. vicarium, a vivarium: see vivarium.] A vivarium.

And before the Mynstre of this Ydole is a Vyvere, in maner of a gret Lake full of Watre: and there in Pil-grymes casten Gold and Sylver, Perles and precyous Stones, with outen nombre, in stede of Offrynges.

Manderley, Travels, p. 174.

Viverra (vi-ver'ä), n. [NL., < L. viverra, a ferret.] A Linnean genus of carnivorous quadru-peds which contained 6 species (now placed in different modern families), and which has by successive restrictions been confined to the true civets as the type of the family Viverridae. See cuts under civet-cat and tangalang.

Viverridae (vi-ver'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Viverra + -idae.] A family of carnivorous mammals, of the euroid or feline series of the fissiped Ferae, typified by the genus Viverra. The family has been made to cover a miscellaneous assortment of animals, such as the civets and bassarids of the New World, some of the Mustelidae, the kinkajou (Cercopithecus), the Cryptoproctidae, etc. Excluding all these, the Viverridae constitute a natural and very extensive and diversified family of small cat-like or weasel-like carnivorous quadrupeds, digitigrade, or almost plantigrade, generally with long, low body, short legs, long and sometimes prehensile or curly tail, and long, sharp snout, and for the most part provided with peculiar anal glands secreting the substance called civet or a similar product. All the Viverridae belong to the Old World, in the warmer parts of which their genera, species, and individuals abound. Their nearest relatives are the hyenas. In the euroid series (see Euroidae) the Viverridae are distinguished by the number of their teeth, which are thirty-four to forty, there being on each side of the upper jaw two molars (exceptionally one), four premolars (exceptionally three), one canine, and three incisors; and on each side of the lower jaw two molars, four premolars (exceptionally three), one canine, and three incisors; the upper molars and the back lower molar are tuberculate. The Viverridae fall naturally into two main divisions, based primarily upon certain cranial characters, and distinguished outwardly by the arched toes and sharp retractile claws of the one section, as contrasted with the straight toes and blunt claws of the other:
these are respectively styled europod or cat-footed, and cynopod or dog-footed. The former is the viverrine section in strictness, the latter the herpestine section; each has several subfamilies. (a) To the viverrine section belong the typical civets and genets, forming the subfamily Viverrinae:
the prionodonts, Prionodontinae; the galidians, Galidiinae;
the palm-cats or paradoxures, with curly tails,
Paradoxurinae; the binturongs, Arctictitinae; the hemi-galids, Hemigalidinae; and the cynogales, Cynogalinae. (See cuts under civet-cat, Cynogale, Galidictis, genet, musang, nandine, and tangalang.) (b) To the herpestine section belong the numerous ichneumonids, mongooses, etc., forming the restricted Herpestinae, of which upward of 12 genera and many species are known; the cynictids, Cynictinae;
the Ichneumoninae; and the suricates, Suricatae. (See cuts under Cynictis, ichneumon, and Suricata.) In all, there are some 50 genera of Viverridae, of 11 subfamilies of 2 sections. Besides furnishing the civet of commerce, the Viverridae take the place of ordinary cats and weasels in destroying smaller vermin, and some of them are of the greatest service, owing to their destruction of venomous reptiles, crocodiles' eggs, etc.

viverriform (vi-ver'i-fôrm), a. [L. viverra, ferret, + forma, form.] Viverrine in form and structure: noting the large series of Old World quadrupeds of the families Viverridae and Eupleridae.

Viverrinae (viv-e-rî'nê), n. pl. [NL., < Viverra + -inae.] A division of Viverridae. (a) Broadly, one of two subfamilies of Viverridae, the other being Her-pestinae, distinguishing the civets, genets, etc., from the ichneumonids, etc.; the cat-footed Viverridae, as distinguished from the dog-footed series of the same. (b) Narrowly, one of 11 subfamilies of Viverridae, including only the civets and genets proper, of the genera Viverra, Viver-

Rasse (Viverrinae malaccensis).

ricula, and Genetta, having the body comparatively robust and cat-like, and the molars 2 above and 1 below on each side. See also cuts under civet-cat, genet, and tangalang.

viverrine (vi-ver'in), a. and n. [L. viverrinus, < L. viverra, a ferret: see viverra.] I. a.
Of or pertaining to the Viverridae; viverriform in a proper sense; more particularly, belonging to the Viverrinae; not herpestine. Viverrine cat, the warata, Felis viverrina of India, a true cat. Vi-verrine dasyure, a variety of Dasyurus maugei of South Australia and Tasmania.

II. n. A member of the Viverridae, and especially of the Viverrinae.
Also viverrin.

vivers (vê'vêrz), n. pl. [F. vivres, provisions, < vivre, live, < L. vivere, live. Cf. viand.] Food; eatables; victuals. [Scotch.]

I could never away with raw oatmeal, stockened with water, in all my life. Call it drammock or crowdie, or just what ye list, my vivers must thole fire and water.

Scott, Pirate, v.

vives (vîvz), n. pl. [Also corruptly vires; shortened from arives, < OF. arives, also vires, a disease of horses. < Sp. arivas, arivas = Pg. adibe (cf. It. virale, ML. virole), a disease of animals, < Ar. addhiba, < al. the, + dhiba, she-wolf.] A disease of animals, particularly of horses, and more especially of young horses at grass, located in the glands under the ear, where a tumor is formed which sometimes ends in suppuration.

Vives, "Certaine kernels growing under the horses eare." Topsell, 1607, p. 360. (Halliwell.)

vivianite (viv'i-an-î), n. [Named after J. H. Vivian, an English metallurgist.] In mineral, a hydrous phosphate of iron protoxide, occurring crystallized, also cleavable, massive, fibrous, and earthy, nearly colorless when altered, but on exposure becoming blue or green. The earthy variety, called blue iron earth or native Prussian blue, is sometimes used as a pigment.

vidid (viv'id), a. [< L. vividus, animated, spirited, < vivere, live, akin to vita, life, Gr. bios, life, Skt. √ jiv, live: see vital and quick.] 1. Exhibiting the appearance of life or freshness; animated; bright; clear; lively; fresh; strong; intense: as, the vidid colors of the rainbow; the vidid green of flourishing vegetables.

The fullest and most vidid colours.

Norton, Opticks, I. ii. 10.

Vivid was the light

Which flashed at this from out the other's eye.

Wordsworth.

All yielding is attended with a less vidid consciousness than resistance. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 13.

A good style is the vidid expression of clear thinking.

Huxley, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 461.

2. Producing a distinct and strong impression on the mind; presented to the mind with exceptional clearness and force; of a mental faculty, having a clear and vigorous action.

Where the genius is bright, and the imagination vidid, the power of memory may be too much neglected and lose its improvement. Watts, Improvement of the Mind, i. 17.

Pope, whose vidid genius almost persuaded wit to renounce its proper nature and become poetic.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 159.

Somewhere in the list of our imaginations of absent feelings there must be found the vididest of all. These optical reproductions of real form are the vididest of all. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 260.

vidid (viv'id), a. [< L. vividus, animated, spirited, < vivere, live, akin to vita, life, Gr. bios, life, Skt. √ jiv, live: see vital and quick.] 1. Exhibiting the appearance of life or freshness; animated; bright; clear; lively; fresh; strong; intense: as, the vidid colors of the rainbow; the vidid green of flourishing vegetables.

vididity (vi-vid'i-ti), n. [< vivid + -ity.] 1. The character or state of being vidid; vididness. [Rare.]

Strength of attention, clearness of discernment, amplitude of comprehension, vididity and rapidity of imagination. Bentham, Introduct. to Morals and Legislation, vi. 12.

2*t.* Vitality.

The withdrawing of competent meat and drink from the body . . . makes way for dryness, whence the kindly heat (which, like other fire, might be a good servant, must needs be an ill master), getting more than due and wonted strength, . . . turns on that substantial vididity, exsiccating and consuming it.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 430.

vididly (viv'id-li), adv. In a vidid manner; so as to be vidid, in any sense.

vididness (viv'id-nês), n. The property of being vidid, in any sense; vididity.

All great steps in science require a peculiar distinctness and vididness of thought in the discoverer. Whewell.

vivific (vi-vîf'ik), a. [= F. vivifique = Sp. vivifico = Pg. It. vivifico, < LL. vivificus, making alive, quickening: see vivify.] Giving life; reviving; enlivening; vivifying. [Rare.]

Without whose (the sun's) salutary and vivific beams all motion . . . would speedily cease, and nothing be left here below but darkness and death.

Ray, Works of Creation, I.

vivifical (vi-vîf'ik-al), a. [< vivific + -al.] Same as vivific.

vivificant (vi-vîf'ik-ant), a. [= OF. vivifiant = Sp. Pg. vivificante, < LL. vivificant(-s), ppr. of vivificare, make alive: see vivify.] Vivifying; vivifying. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 685.

vivificate (vi-vîf'ik-ât), v. t.; pret. and pp. vivificated, ppr. vivificating. [< LL. vivificatus, pp. of vivificare, make alive: see vivify.] 1. To give life to; animate; vivify. [Rare.]

With his understanding free to think of other things, even as God vivificates and actuates the whole world, being yet wholly free to contemplate himself.

Dr. H. More, Philosophic Cabbala, i.

2. In old chem., to restore or reduce to the natural state or to the metallic state, as a substance from a solution or a metal from an oxid; revive.

vivification (viv'i-fî-kâ'shôn), n. [< F. vivification = Sp. vivificación = Pg. vivificação = It. vivificazione, < LL. vivificatio(-n), a making alive, a quickening, < vivificare, pp. vivificatus, make alive: see vivify.] 1. The act of vivifying, or the state of being vivified; the act of giving life; revival. [Rare.]

The nature of vivification is best inquired in creatures bred of putrefaction. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 695.

Sub. And when comes vivification?

Face. After mortification.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

It (the heart) is the member that hath first life in man, and it is the last that dies in man, and to all the other members gives vivification. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 258.

2. In physiol., the transformation of proteid matter into living tissue, occurring as the final stage of assimilation.

vivificative (viv'i-fî-kâ-tiv), a. [< vivificate + -ive.] Capable of vivifying. [Rare.]

That lower vivificative principle of his soul did grow . . . strong, and did . . . vigorously, and with . . . exultant sympathy and joy, actuate his vehicle.

Dr. H. More, Philosophic Cabbala, ii.

vivifier (viv'i-fî-ër), n. One who vivifies; a quickener.

He [man] has need of a Vivifier, because he is dead.

St. Augustine, On Nature and Grace (trans.), xxv.

vivify (viv'i-fî), v.; pret. and pp. vivified, ppr. vivifying. [< F. vivifier = Sp. Pg. vivificar = It. vivificare, < LL. vivificare, make alive, restore to life, quicken (cf. vivificus, making alive), < vivus, alive, + facere, make, do.] 1. trans. To make to be living; endue with life; animate; enliven; inspire as if with life. Harvey.

Winds of hostility . . . rather irritated and vivified the sense of security. De Quincey, Philos. of Rom. Hist.

Her childish features were vivified and enlightened by an expression of innocent intelligence charming to behold. The Century, XXXVIII. 213.

II. intrans. To impart life or animation.

The second Adam, sleeping in a vivifying death, only for the salvation of Mankind, should sanctify his Spouse the Church by those Sacraments which were derived out of his side. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 374.

Viviparat (vi-vîp'â-râ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of LL. viviparus, viviparus; see viviparus.] Those vertebrates which are viviparous: an old division, contrasted with Ovipara, and containing the mammals. De Blainville. The division is worthless, as some mammals are oviparous, and many of the lower vertebrates are viviparous, as are also some invertebrates. The name is a survival of the unfittest from the time of Aristotle, the later Vivipara or Zoitoka being the ζωοτοκώδιντα ἐν αὐτοῖς (mammals) of that author.

Viviparidæ (viv-i-par'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Viviparus (the typical genus) + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Viviparus. They have a flat foot, moderate rostrum, elongate tentacles, with one of which the male organ is adnate, eyes on prominences at the outer bases of the tentacles, radular teeth 3, 1, 3, the median broad, the lateral obliquely oblong, and the marginal with narrow bases or unguiform; the shell spiral, with a continuous peritreme, and a more or less concentric operculum. It is a cosmopolitan group of fresh-water shells. Representatives of four genera occur in the United States, but of one only in Europe. They have often been called Paludinidæ.

viviparity (viv-i-par'i-ti), n. [< vivipar(ous) + -ity.] The state, character, or condition of being viviparous; the act, process, or result of bringing forth alive.

viviparoid (vi-vîp'â-roid), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Viviparidæ.

II. n. One of the Viviparidæ.

viviparous (vi-vîp'â-rus), a. [= F. vivipare = Sp. viviparo = Pg. It. viviparo, < LL. viviparus, that brings forth young alive, < L. vivus, alive, + parere, bring forth, produce.] 1. Bringing forth alive; having young which maintain vascular vital connection with the body of the parent until they are born in a comparatively advanced stage of development; reproducing by birth, not by hatching from an egg which is laid and afterward incubated: correlated with oviparous and ovoviviparous. See these words, and egg. In strictness, all metazoic animals and some protozoans are oviparous, since they produce ova; but the distinction subsists in the duration of the period in which the product of conception remains in the body of the parent. If the egg is quickly extruded, the animal is oviparous; if it is separated from the mother, but hatches inside the body, ovoviviparous; if it comes to term in a womb, viviparous. Among vertebrates, all mammals excepting monotremes, no birds, many reptiles, and some fishes are viviparous. Invertebrates are mostly oviparous, in some cases ovoviviparous, in a few viviparous.

2. In bot., germinating or sprouting from a seed or bud which is still on the parent plant. The term is also sometimes equivalent to proliferous as applied to grasses, rushes, sedges, etc. See proliferation, 2.

From an examination of the structure of viviparous grasses. Masters, Teratol., p. 169.

Viviparous blenny, Zoarces viviparus (formerly Blennius viviparus), a fish of the family Lyodontidæ. See Zoarces. — Viviparous fish, a fish which brings forth alive, especially a viviparous perch. Numerous other fishes, belonging to different families, are of this character, as nearly if not all of the Lyodontidæ, including the so-called viviparous blenny, certain scorpenoids, cyprinodonts, blind-fishes, and most sharks and rays. — Viviparous knotweed, the serpent-grass, Polygonum viviparum. — Viviparous lizard, the British Zootoca vivipara. See Zootoca. — Viviparous perch. See perch, surf-fish, and Embiotridæ. — Viviparous shell, any member of the Viviparidæ.

viviparously (vi-vîp'â-rus-li), adv. In a viviparous manner; by viviparity.

viviparousness (vi-vîp'â-rus-nês), n. Same as viviparity.

Viviparus (vi-vîp'â-rus), n. [NL. (Montfort, 1810), < LL. viviparus; see viviparus.] The typical genus of Viviparidæ, to which very different limits have been ascribed, but always including such species as V. vulgaris and V. contectus of Europe. Several closely related species inhabit the United States, as V. georgianus and V. contectoides.

viviperception (viv'i-pêr-sép'shôn), n. [< L. vivus, living, + perceptio(-n), perception.] The observation of physiological functions or vital processes in their natural action without dissection of the living body: distinguished from observation by means of vivisection. J. J. G. Wilkinson. [Rare.]

vivisect (viv-i-sekt'), v. [< L. vivus, living, + sectus, pp. of secare, cut.] 1. trans. To dissect the living body of; practise vivisection upon; anatomize, as a living animal. Athenæum, No. 3200, p. 252. [Recent.]

II. intrans. To practise vivisection; dissect a living animal. [Recent.]

vivisection (viv-i-sek'shôn), n. [< F. vivisection = Sp. vivisección, < L. vivus, living, + sectio(-n), a cutting: see section.] Dissection of a living body; the practice of anatomizing alive, or of experimenting upon living animals, for the purpose of investigating some physiological function or pathological process which cannot well be otherwise determined. Vivisection strictly includes only cutting operations; but the term is extended to any physiological experimentation upon living animals, as compression of parts by ligatures, subjection of the creature to special conditions of atmospheric pressure, temperature, and food, exhibition of poisons or other drugs, inoculation of disease, etc. Vivisection in competent and humane hands, under proper and reasonable restrictions, is fruitful of good results to the sciences of physiology and pathology.

The Vivisection Act of 1876 . . . is intended for the protection of vertebrate animals liable to be employed alive in physiological experiments. Encyc. Brit., XV. 799.

Painless vivisection, callisection.

vivisectional (viv-i-sek'shôn-al), a. [< vivisection + -al.] Of or pertaining to vivisection.

The best way to enter the subject will be to take a lower creature, like a frog, and study by the vivisectional method the functions of his different nerve-centres.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 111.

vivisectionist (viv-i-sek'shôn-ist), n. [< vivisection + -ist.] A vivisector; also, one who favors or defends the practice of vivisection.

Physiology, it is said, can scarcely be called a science as yet, and the contributions of vivisectionists to the understanding and amelioration of human suffering have been almost nothing. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 20.

vivisector (viv-i-sek'tôr), n. [< L. vivus, living, + sector, a cutter: see sector.] One who practises vivisection.

A judge or jury might have opinions as to the comparative value of the results obtained which would differ widely from those of the vivisector himself.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VII. 682.

vivisectorium (viv'i-sek-tô-ri-um), n.; pl. vivisectoria (-î). [NL.: see vivisect.] A place where vivisections are made.

Students have turned away sickened not only from the vivisectorium but from the study of medicine.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 20.

viviseulture (viv-i-sep-ul-tür), n. [< L. vivus, living, + sepultura, burial: see sepulture.] The burial of a person alive. [Rare.]

Viviparus vulgaris, the branchia and embryos seen through the shell.

Viviparus contectus, one of the Viviparidæ.

Forth came the human pair,
And join'd their vocal worship to the quire.

Some years hence, for all we know, we may be able to transmit the vocal message itself, with the very inflection, tone, and accent of the speaker.

J. Baile (1871), quoted in Prescott's Elect. Invent., p. 47.

A tin pipe ascends through the ceiling, and forms a medium of vocal communication with other parts of the edifice.

Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 7.

2. Having a voice; endowed, or as if endowed, with a voice; possessed of utterance or audible expression.

The stream, the wood, the gale,
Is vocal with the plaintive wail.

Scott, L. of L. M., v. 2.

The roving bee proclaims aloud
Her flight by vocal wings.

Wordsworth, Gold and Silver Fishes in a Vase.

The tide flows down, the wave again
Is vocal in its wooded walls.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, xix.

3. In phonetics: (a) Voiced; uttered with voice as distinct from breath; sonant: said of certain alphabetic sounds or letters, as z or v or b as distinguished from s or f or p respectively. (b) Having a vowel character or function; vowel.

The vocal (vowel) mechanism is the first that is manifested in the child. Allen, and Neurol. (trans.), VIII. 7.

4. In zool., voiced; uttered by the mouth; formed in the vocal organs: distinguished from sonoric: noting the cries of animals, as distinguished from the mechanical noises they may make, as the stridulation of an insect.

—Vocal auscultation, examination by the sound of the voice as transmitted through the lungs and chest-wall.

—Vocal cords. See cord. —Vocal fremitus, a vibration felt on palpation of the wall of the chest when the subject speaks in an audible tone. Also called voice-thrill, pectoril fremitus, and pectoril thrill.

—Vocal glottis. Same as rima vocalis (which see, under rima). —Vocal music, music prepared for or produced by the human voice alone or accompanied by instruments, in distinction from instrumental music, which is prepared for or produced by instruments alone.

—Vocal process, the prolonged inner basal angle of the arytenoid cartilage, to which the true vocal cord is attached.

—Vocal resonance. See resonance. —Vocal score. See score, v. —Vocal spiracle, in entom., a thoracic spiracle or breathing-pore having a peculiar interior apparatus supposed to produce sounds, as in the bees and many flies.

—Vocal tone, an instrumental tone similar in quality to the singing-tone of the human voice.

—Vocal tube, in anat., the space which the sound of the voice has to traverse after it is produced in the glottis, including the passages through the nose and mouth.

II. n. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a man who has a right to vote in certain elections.

vocalic (vō-kal'ik), a. [< vocal + -ic.] Relating to, consisting of, or resembling vowel sounds; containing many vowels.

The Gaelic language, being uncommonly vocalic, is well adapted for sudden and extemporaneous poetry.

Scott, Waverley, xxii.

The vowels become more consonantal; the consonants become more vocalic.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., iv.

vocalisation, vocalise. See vocalization, vocalize.

vocalism (vō-kal'izm), n. [< F. vocalisme; as vocal + -ism.] 1. The exercise of the vocal organs in speech or song; vocalization.

We should now be talking in monosyllables, and eking out our scantiness of vocalism by nods, shrugs, winks, and other resources of pantomime. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 19.

2. A vocalic sound.

To utter such thick-lipped vocalisms as Mosos.

Earle, Philology of Eng. Tongue, i. § 126.

3. See nominalism.

vocalist (vō-kal'ist), n. [< F. vocaliste; as vocal + -ist.] A vocal musician; a singer, as opposed to an instrumental performer.

She was a good vocalist; and, even in speech, her voice commanded a great range of changes.

R. L. Stevenson, Prince Otto, ii. 4.

vocality (vō-kal'i-ti), n.; pl. vocalities (-tiz). [= Sp. vocalidad, < L. vocalitas (-tis) (tr. Gr. εἰσφωμία), open sound, euphony, < vocalis, sounding, sonorous: see vocal.] The quality of being vocal. (a) The quality of being utterable or capable of being expressed by the voice in speech or song.

I did hear Mrs. Manuel and one of the Italians, her gallant, sing well. But yet I confess I am not delighted so much with it as to admire it; for not understanding the words, I lose the benefit of the vocalities of the music, and it proves only instrumental.

Pepys, Diary, III. 334.

L and R being in extremes, one of Roughness, the other of Smoothness and freeness of Vocality, are not easie, in tract of Vocal speech, to be pronounced spiritaly.

Holder, Elem. of Speech, p. 58.

(b) The quality of being a vowel; vowel character: as, the vocality of a sound.

vocalization (vō-kal-i-zā'shon), n. [< F. vocalisation = Sp. vocalización; as vocalize + -ation.] 1. The act of vocalizing or uttering with the voice, the state of being so uttered, or the manner of such utterance, whether in speech or in song: as, the deceptive vocalizations of a ventriloquist.

Knowing what one discontented woman can do in the way of vocalization, it is possible to imagine the clamor multiplied by hundreds. The Century, XXXVII. 585.

2. The formation and utterance of vowel sounds.

Vocalization (vowelizing) is the expression of an emotion, an indistinct sensation, not an idea.

Allen, and Neurol. (trans.), VIII. 7.

Also spelled vocalisation.

vocalize (vō-kal'iz), v.; pret. and pp. vocalized, ppr. vocalizing. [< F. vocaliser = Sp. vocalizar = It. vocalizzare; as vocal + -ize.] I. trans.

1. To form into voice; make vocal.

It is one thing to breathe, or give impulse to breath alone, and another thing to vocalize that breath, i. e., in its passage through the larynx to give it the sound of humane voice.

Holder, Elem. of Speech, p. 30.

2. To utter with voice and not merely with breath; make sonant: as, f vocalized is equivalent to v. —3. To write with vowel points; insert the vowels in, as in the writing of the Semitic languages.

The question "Should Turkish poetry be vocalized?" is answered in the affirmative by R. Dvorak. Arabic books, especially Arabic poetry, are vocalized in the East as well as in the West. Turkish books to some extent, and this should be done throughout. D. advocates the use of Arabic vowel-signs, which would prove a great help to the student.

Amer. Jour. Philol., x. 232.

II. intrans. To use the voice; speak; sing; hum.

The young lady who was still strolling along in front of them, softly vocalizing. H. James, Jr., Daisy Miller, i. 45.

Also spelled vocalise.

vocally (vō-kal'i), adv. 1. In a vocal manner; with voice. —2. In words; verbally; orally.

To express . . . desires vocally.

Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

3. In song; by means of singing: opposed to instrumentally. —4. In respect of vowels or vocalic sounds.

Syllables which are vocally of the lowest consideration.

Earle, Philology of Eng. Tongue, xii. § 647.

vocalness (vō-kal'nes), n. The quality of being vocal; vocality.

vocation (vō-kā'shon), n. [< F. vocation = Sp. vocación = Pg. vocação = It. vocazione, < L. vocatio(n-), a summons, a calling, < vocare, pp. vocatus, call, < vox (voc-), voice: see voice.] 1. A calling or designation to a particular activity, office, or duty; a summons; a call; in theol., a call, under God's guidance, to the Christian life or some special state, service, or ministry.

Follow thou thy vocation, and serve the king when he calleth thee. Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Heaven is his vocation, and therefore he counts earthly employments avocations.

Fuller, Holy and Profane State, IV. ix. 10.

The golden chain of vocation, election, and justification. Jer. Taylor.

Where there is the perception of an ideal, we may expect to find the sense of a vocation.

J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 127.

2. Employment; occupation; avocation; calling; business; trade: including professions as well as mechanical occupations. See avocation, 5.

Why, Hal, 'tis my vocation, Hal; 'tis no sin for a man to labour in his vocation. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2. 116.

The respective or special duty of every man, in his profession, vocation, and place.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

If wit or wisdom be the head, if honesty be the heart, industry is the right hand of every vocation.

Barrow, Sermons, III. xiv.

=Syn. 2. Calling, Business, etc. See occupation.

vocational (vō-kā'shon-al), a. [< vocation + -al.] Pertaining or relating to a vocation or occupation.

vocationally (vō-kā'shon-al-i), adv. As respects a vocation, occupation, or trade.

But the seamanship of those days, the strategies, the devices, the expedients, are no longer of the least value vocationally.

Athenæum, No. 3266, p. 697.

vocative (vō-kā'tiv), a. and n. [< F. vocatif = Sp. Pg. It. vocativo = G. vocatin, < L. vocativus, of or pertaining to calling, as a noun (sc. casus) the vocative case, < vocare, pp. vocatus, call: see vocation.] I. a. Relating to the act of calling or addressing by name; compellative: applied to the grammatical case in which a person or thing is addressed: as, the vocative case.

II. n. In gram., the case employed in calling to or addressing a person or thing: as, Domine, 'O Lord,' is the vocative of the Latin dominus.

Vochysia (vō-kis'i-ä), n. [NL. (Jussieu, 1789), from the name among the Galibis of Guiana.]

A genus of plants, type of the order Vochysiales. It is characterized by flowers with three (or fewer) petals, a single fertile stamen, and a three-celled ovary with two ovules in each cell. There are about 55 species, natives of Brazil, Guiana, eastern Peru, and the United States of Colombia. They are tall trees, or sometimes shrubs, often resinous, and with very handsomely netted-veined coriaceous leaves. The flowers are large, bright-orange or yellow, and odoriferous, forming elongated compound racemes or panicles; the leaves are decussate and opposite, or whorled. The wood is a valuable compact but not durable timber; that of V. Guianensis is known as itaball-wood and copaivé-wood. The flowers are singularly irregular: the posterior sepal is much larger than the other four, and usually spurred, and the petals are linear and spatulate, the anterior being much the larger. The fruit is a coriaceous and woody three-celled and three-valved capsule, containing three erect winged or cottony seeds.

Vochysiaceæ (vō-kis-i-ä'sé-ä), n. pl. [NL. (A. St. Hilaire, 1820), < Vochysia + -aceæ.] An order of polypetalous plants, of the series Thalamifloræ and cohort Polypetalinæ. It is characterized by irregular flowers, a three-celled ovary, and a straight embryo, usually without albumen. It includes about 130 species, belonging to 7 genera, of which the type Vochysia with 55, Qualea with 33, and Trigonia with 25 species are the chief; all occur mostly in Brazil and Guiana. They are trees, often of immense size and with a copious resinous juice, fetid in the genus Callisthene; a few are shrubs, and one genus, Trigonia, is sarmentose or twining. The flowers are bisexual, irregular, variously colored, often large, handsome, and odoriferous, and commonly racemose or panicle. They are remarkable in some of the genera for producing but a single petal, or but a single fertile stamen. The fruit is usually an oblong terete or three-angled capsule, with three coriaceous valves, often with winged pilose or cottony seeds, and large leaf-like corrugated cotyledons; in Erisma, a genus of trees of great size, the fruit is a very peculiar samara with long coriaceous falcate reticulated wings developed from calyx-segments.

9. A word; a term; a vocable. Udall.—10. In phonetics, sound uttered with resonance of the vocal cords, and not with a mere emission of breath; sonant utterance.—11. In gram., that form of the verb or body of inflections which shows the relation of the subject of the affirmation or predication to the action expressed by the verb. In Latin there are two voices, active and passive, having different endings throughout. In Greek and Sanskrit the voices are active and middle, certain forms, mostly middle, being used in a passive sense. In English, again, there is no distinction of voices; every verb is active, and a passive meaning belongs only to certain verb-phrases, made with help of an auxiliary; thus, he is praised, we have been loved.—Equal voices, in music. See equal.—In my voice, in my name.

Implore her, in my voice, that she make friends

To the strict deputy. Shak., M. for M., i. 2. 185.

Voicing the leader-on a demi-god.

Ford, Broken Heart, i. 2.

Rumour will voice me the contempt of manhood.
Should I run on thus. Ford, Broken Heart, iii. 2.

5. In phonetics, to utter with voice or tone or sonance, as distinguished from breath.

II.† intrans. To speak; vote; give opinion.
I remember, also, that this place [Acts xvi.] is pretended for the people's power of voicing in councils.
Jer. Taylor, Episcopacy Assented, § 41.

voiced (voist), a. [< voice + -ed]. Furnished with a voice: usually in composition: as, sweet-voiced.

That's Erythraea,
Or some angel voiced like her.
Sir J. Denham, The Sophy. (Latham.)

voiceful (vois'fûl), a. [< voice + -ful]. Having a voice; vocal; sounding.

The seniors then did bear
The voiceful heralds' sceptres, sat within a sacred sphere,
On polish'd stones, and gave by turns their sentence.
Chapman, Iliad, xviii. 459.

The swelling of the voiceful sea.
Coleridge, Fancy in Nubibus.

voicefulness (vois'ful-nes), n. The property or state of being voiceful; vocality.

In the wilds of these isles one drinks in the spirit of the sea, and its deep voicefulness fills the air.
Portfolio, N. S., IX. 187.

voiceless (vois'les), a. [< voice + -less]. 1. Having no voice, utterance, or vote; mute; dumb.
The proctors of the clergy were voiceless assistants.
Coke. (Latham.)

Childless and crownless, in her voiceless woe.
Byron, Child Harold, iv. 79.

2. In phonetics, not voiced or sonant; surd.

voicelessness (vois'les-nes), n. The state of being voiceless; silence.

voice-part (vois'pârt), n. See part, 5, and part-writing.

voicer (voi'sér), n. One who voices or regulates the tone of organ-pipes.

voice-thrill (vois'thril), n. Same as vocal fremitus (which see, under vocal).

voicing (voi'sing), n. [Verbal n. of voice, v.] The act, process, or result of regulating the tone of organ-pipes, so that they shall sound with the proper power, pitch, and quality. Voicing is the most delicate and important branch of organ-building, since success in it depends on attention to the minutest details.

void (void), a. and n. [*< ME. void, voyd, void, < OF. void, vuide, m. and f., also void, vuid, vuit, m., empty, waste, vast, wide, hollow, also deprived, destitute, devoid; as a noun, a void, waste; F. vide, empty, devoid; according to the usual derivation, < L. viduus, bereft of husband or wife, bereft, deprived; but this derivation is difficult phonetically and in view of the existing F. veuf, m., veuve, f., widowed, deprived (as a noun, a widower, widow), from the same L. viduus. The F. vide for vuide, however, has been influenced by association with the L. viduus. Another derivation, < LL. as if *vocitus for *vacitus, akin to vacari, be empty, vacuus, empty, vacuus, vocitus (see vacuus, vacant), rests on assumption. Cf. avoid, devoid.*] I. a. 1. Empty, or not containing matter; vacant; not occupied; unfilled: as, a void space or place.
And he that shall a-complysse that sete must also complysse the voyde place at the table that Ioseph made.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), i. 61.
The earth was without form, and void [was waste and void, R. V.], and darkness was upon the face of the deep.
Gen. i. 2.
I'll get me to a place more void, and there
Speak to great Cæsar as he comes along.
Shak., J. C., ii. 4. 37.
In the void offices around Rung not a hoof, nor bayed a hound.
Scott, Rokeby, ii. 17.

2. Having no holder or possessor; vacant; unoccupied: without incumbent.

The Bishoprick of Winchester falling void, the king sends presently to the Monks of the Cathedral Church to elect his Brother Athelmar.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 83.

A plantation should be begun at Agawan (being the best place in the land for tillage and cattle), least an enemy, finding it void, should possess and take it from us.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 118.

3†. Not taken up with business; leisure.

All the void time that is between the hours of work, sleep, and meat, that they be suffered to bestow every man as he liketh best himself.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 4.

I chain him in my study, that, at void hours,
I may run over the story of his country. Massinger.

4. Being without; devoid; destitute; lacking; without; free from: usually with of: as, void of learning; void of common sense.

The moste parte of noble men and gentlemen within this Realme have bene brought up ignorantly and void of good education.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 10.

Ye must be void from that desperate solicitude.
Traces, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 3.
He that is void of wisdom despiseth his neighbour.
Prov. xi. 12.

5. Not producing any effect; ineffectual; useless; vain; superfluous.

Voide leves pold to be,
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 150.

Wyth bones & voyd morsels fyll not thy trenchour, my friend, full.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 79.

My word . . . shall not return to me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please.
Isa. lv. 11.

The game [rocks of Scilly] is reckoned in the same manner as at mississippi, and the cast is void if the ball does not enter any of the holes.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 398.

6. Specifically, in law, without legal efficacy; incapable of being enforced by law; having no legal or binding force; null; not effectual to bind parties, or to convey or support a right: as, a deed not duly signed and sealed is void; a promise without consideration is void. In strictness the word is appropriate only of that which is so utterly without effect that a person may act as if it did not exist; but a thing may be void as to some persons and not as to others. Void is, however, often used in place of voidable. Voidable is appropriate for that which a person has the right to make of no effect by application to court to have it adjudged void, or in some cases by notice or declaration, as a conveyance in fraud of creditors which is effectual between the parties, but may be avoided by a creditor, or a contract of an infant, which may be effectual until he has disaffirmed it. That which is void is generally held incapable of confirmation; that which is simply voidable may be confirmed.

7†. Devoid of wealth; poor.

Yif thou haddst entred in the path of this lyf a voyde wayferyng man, than woldest thou synge byforn the thief.
Chaucer, Boethius, ii. prose 5.

To make void, to render useless or of no effect.

For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect. Rom. iv. 14.

It was thy device
By this alliance to make void my suit.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 142.

Void for uncertainty, said of a legal instrument the language of which is so vague or ambiguous that it cannot take effect.—Void space, in physics, a vacuum.—Syn. 1, 2, and 4. Devoid, etc. See vacant.—6. Invalid.

II. n. 1. An empty or unoccupied space; a vacuum.

The Void of Heav'n a gloomy Horror fills.
Congreve, Birth of the Muse.

The illimitable Void.
Thomson, Summer, i. 34.

I do not like to see anything destroyed, any void produced in society.
Burke, Rev. in France.

What peaceful hours I once enjoyed!
How sweet their memory still!
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill.
Cowper, Oh, for a closer walk with God!

2. An opening; a solution of continuity in an inclosure of any kind; a space unfilled or not built up, as contrasted with closed or occupied areas.

The clerestory window [of Notre Dame, Paris], . . . although larger than such openings had been in Romanesque design, . . . nevertheless is simply an opening in a wall, the area of the solid still being greater than that of the void.
C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 86.

3†. The last course or remove; the dessert.

There was a void of spice-plates and wine.
Coronation of Anne Boleyn (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 50).

void (void), v. [< ME. voiden, < OF. voider, voidier, voidier, voider, F. voider = Pr. voir, voyer, vuier, voidar = Cat. vuydar, make void; from the adj. Cf. avoid.] I. trans. 1. To make or leave vacant; quit; vacate; depart from; leave; hence, to clear; free; empty.

They voided the cite of Ravenne by certeyn day assigned.
Chaucer, Boethius, i. prose 4.

Now this feast is done, voyde ye the table.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 271.

Good Frederick, see the rooms be voided straight.
Marlowe, Faustus, iii. 4.

If they will fight with us, bid them come down,
Or void the field.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 7. 62.

The princes would be private. Void the presence.
Marston, The Fawne, iii.

2. To emit, throw, or send out; empty out; specifically, to evacuate from the intestine or bladder: as, to void excrementitious matter.

The place of the Welles and of the Walles and of many other things ben zit apterly sene; but the riches is voyded cleue.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 279.

When the water was all voided, they saugh the two stones that were vpon the two dragons.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), i. 38.

You that did void your rheum upon my beard,
And foot me as you spurn a stranger cur
Over your threshold.
Shak., M. of V., i. 3. 118.

3†. To lay aside; cease to use; divest one's self of.

He was glad of the game, & o goode chere
Voided his viser, autentid hym selwyn.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 7092.

His locks, as blacke as pitchy night,
Were bound about and voyded from before.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. vii. 43.

4. To invalidate; annul; nullify; render of no validity or effect.

It was become a practice . . . to void the security that was at any time given for money so borrowed. Clarendon.

5†. To avoid; shun.

I voyde companye, I fle gladnesse.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 295.

This was the meane to voyde theyre stryves
And alle olde gruchelyng, and her hartis to glade.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 21.

6†. To dismiss; send away.

He leet voyden out of his Chambre alle maner of men,
Lords and others: for he wolde speke with me in Con-seille.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 137.

So when it liked hire to gon to reste,
And voyded weren they that voyden oughte.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 912.

II. intrans. 1†. To go; depart.

With grete indygnacyon charged hym shortly without delaye to voyde out of his londe.
Joseph of Arimathe (E. E. T. S.), p. 32.

Hit vanist verayly & voyded of sy3t.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1547.

Let all that sweet is void! In me no mirth may dwell.
F. Greville (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 296).

2. (a†) To have an evacuation.

Here, for example, is "the memorable and prodigious history of a girl who for many years neither ate nor slept nor voided."
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI. 544.

(b) To be emitted or evacuated. Wiseman, Surgery. [Rare.]—3†. To become empty or vacant.

Hit is wel oure entent whanne any sucche benefice voydeth of oure yifte yat ye make collacion to him yr of.
Henry V. (Ellis's Hist. Letters, I. 71).

voidable (voi'da-bl), a. [< void + -able]. 1. Capable of being voided or evacuated.—2. In law, such that some person has a right to have it annulled. See void, v. t., 6.

Such administration is not void, but voidable by sentence.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

Voidable contract. See contract.

voidance (voi'dans), n. [< ME. voidaunce, < OF. voidance, < voider, make void: see void, v.] 1. The act of voiding or emptying.

Voydaunce (or voydyng), vacacio, evacuacio.
Prompt. Parv., p. 511.

2. The act of casting away or getting rid.

What pains they require in the voidance of fond conceits.
Barrow, Sermons, III. xviii.

3. The act of ejecting from a benefice; ejection.—4. The state of being void; vacancy, as of a benefice.—5†. Evasion; subterfuge.

And therefore I am resolved, when I come to my answer, not to trick my innocency (as I writ to the Lords) by cavillations or voidances, but to speak them the language that my heart speaketh to me, in excusing, extenuating, or ingenuously confessing.
Bacon, Letters, p. 137. (Latham.)

voided (voi'ded), a. [< void, n., + -ed]. Having a void or opening; pierced through; specifically, in her., pierced through so as to show the field. When the word is used alone it generally denotes that only a narrow rim is left of the bearing described as voided. See voided per cross, below. Also coursive, vuide.

All [spangles] are voided: that is, hollow in the middle, with the circumference not flat but convex. . . . Our present spangles, in the flat shape, are quite modern.
S. K. Handbook of Textile Fabrics, p. 93.

Voided of the field. See castle, 2.—Voided per cross, in her., having an opening of the shape of a plain cross cut through it, so as to show the field. See cut under clech.

—Voided per pale, in her., having an opening extending palewise, so as to show the field.

volder (voi'dér), n. [Early mod. E. voyder, < ME. voider; < OF. vuider, a voider, emptier, < vuider, etc., make void: see void, v.] 1. One who or that which voids or annuls; one who vacates or empties.—2. Formerly, a tray or basket for carrying away utensils, dishes, etc., no longer required; especially, a tray or basket in which broken meat was carried from the table.

See ye haue Voyders ready for to auoyd the Morsels that they doe leaue on their Trenchours.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 67.

The fool carries them away in a volder.
Middleton, No Wit like a Woman's, ii. 3.

Enter . . . servingmen . . . with a Voyder and a wooden Knife to take away all.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness.

3. A clothes-basket. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

—4†. A means of avoiding; in the following

Azure a Saltier Voided Argent.

Genoubaux, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 524.

Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 48.

volatilizable (vol'ā-ti-lī-zā-bl), a. [< volatilize + -able.] Capable of being volatilized. Also spelled volatilisable.

volatilization (vol'ā-ti-lī-zā-sh'n), n. [< F. volatilisation = Sp. volatilización = Pg. volatilização = It. volatilizzazione; as volatilize + -ation.] The act or process of volatilizing, etherizing, or diffusing; the act or process of rendering volatile. Boyle. Also spelled volatilisation.

Modern Sociology juts out into the sea of Time two opposite promontories: the promontory of Volatilization, or the dispersion of the individual into the community, and the promontory of Solidification, or the concentration of the community into the individual.

Boardman, Creative Week, p. 112.

The residue thus left by volatilization of the alcohol was neutralized with milk of lime. Science, XIII. 361.

volatilize (vol'ā-ti-lī-z), v.; pret. and pp. volatilized, pp. volatilizing. [< F. volatiliser = Sp. volatilizar = Pg. volatilizar = It. volatilizzare; as volatilis + -ize.] I. trans. To cause to exhale or evaporate; cause to pass off or be diffused in vapor or invisible effluvia.

In temperature as well as brightness, the voltaic arc exceeds all other artificial sources of heat; by its means the most refractory substances are fused and volatilized. G. B. Prescott, Elect. Invent., p. 401.

Emerson, on his part, has volatilized the essence of New England thought into wreaths of spiritual beauty. Stedman, Poets of America, p. 98.

II. intrans. To become volatile; pass off or be diffused in the form of vapor.

It [mercury] also volatilises entirely by heat.

G. Gore, Electro-Metall., p. 358.

As the temperature increases we find . . . metals which volatilize at a low temperature.

J. N. Lockyer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVIII. 77.

Also spelled volatilise.

volation (vō-lā'shōn), n. [< L. volare, pp. volatus, fly: see volant.] Flight, as of a bird; the faculty or power of flight; volitation: as, "the muscles of volation," Coues.

volational (vō-lā'shōn-al), a. [< volation + -al.] Of or pertaining to volation, or the faculty of flight.

volator (vō-lā'tor), n. [< NL. volator, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] That which flies; specifically, a flying-fish.

vol-au-vent (vol'ō-vōn'), n. [F., lit. 'flight in the wind'; vol, flight (see vol); au, in the, to the; vent, wind (see *vent*2).] A sort of raised pie consisting of a delicate preparation of meat, fowl, or fish inclosed in a case of rich light puff-paste.

volborthite (vol'bōr-thīt), n. [So called after Albrecht von Volborth, a Russian physician and scientist, by whom the species was described in 1838.] A mineral occurring in small tabular crystals of a green or yellow color and pearly luster. It is a hydrous copper vanadate.

volcanian (vol-kā'nī-an), a. [< volcano + -ian.] Of or pertaining to a volcano; characteristic of or resembling a volcano; volcanic. [Rare.]

A deep volcanian yellow took the place Of all her milder-mooned body's grace.

Keats, Lamia, i.

volcanic (vol-kā'nīk), a. [= F. volcanique = Sp. volcánico = Pg. vulcanico = It. vulcanico; as volcano + -ic.] Pertaining to or produced by volcanoes or volcanic action: as, volcanic heat, volcanic rock, volcanic phenomena, etc.—

Volcanic bombs, masses of lava, varying greatly in shape and size, but usually roughly rounded and occasionally hollow. Blocks of this kind, of immense size, have been thrown out by some South American volcanoes.—Volcanic focus, the supposed seat or center of activity in a volcanic region or beneath a volcano.—Volcanic glass, vitreous lava; obsidian.—Volcanic mud, the mixture of ashes and water either discharged from the crater of a volcano or formed on its flanks by the downward rush of water: called lava d'acqua in Italy, and moya in South America. It was by mud-lava that Herculaneum was overwhelmed, and mud has been poured out on an immense scale by the volcanoes of Java and South America.—Volcanic rock, rock which has been formed by volcanic agency; lava.

volcanically (vol-kā'nī-kal-i), adv. In the manner of a volcano; eruptively; figuratively, in a fiery or explosive manner.

The accumulation of offences is . . . too literally exploded, blasted asunder volcanically. Carlyle, Heroes, iv.

volcanicity (vol-kā'nīs'ī-ti), n. [< volcanic + -ity.] Same as volcanism: rarely used. It is an imitation of the French term volcanicité formerly in use, but later French writers prefer volcanisme.

The term volcanic action (volcanism or volcanicity) embraces all the phenomena connected with the expulsion of heated materials from the interior of the earth to the surface. Geikie, Text-Book of Geol. (2d ed.), p. 178.

volcanism (vol'kā-nizm), n. [< volcano + -ism.]

The phenomena connected with volcanoes and volcanic activity. As used by Humboldt and some others, it includes also earthquakes, hot springs, and every form of geological dynamics directly connected with the "reaction of the interior of our planet against its crust and surface" (Humboldt). Also vulcanism.

To throw some light on the nature and connection of the chief causes which have been concerned in carrying on that complicated series of geological dynamics which we include under the comprehensive term of volcanism, and of which the earthquake and volcano are two of the most striking manifestations.

J. D. Whitney, Earthquakes, Volcanoes, and Mountain-Building, p. 69.

volcanist (vol'kā-nist), n. [< volcano + -ist.] One who is versed in or occupied with the scientific study of the history and phenomena of volcanoes.

volcanity (vol-kā'nī-ti), n. [< volcan(ic) + -ity.] The state of being volcanic or of volcanic origin. [Rare.]

volcano (vol-kā'nō), n.; pl. volcanoes, volcanos (-nōz). [Formerly also vulcano; = F. volcan (> Sp. volcan = Pg. vulcão, vulcão, < It. vulcano, also vulcano, a burning mountain, prop. first applied to Mt. Etna, which was especially feigned to be the seat of Hephæstus (Vulcan), < L. Vulcanus, later Fulcanus, Vulcan, the god of fire, also fig. fire: see Fulcan.] 1. A mountain or other elevation having at or near its apex an opening in the earth's crust from which heated materials are expelled either continuously or at regular or irregular intervals.

These materials are molten rock (lava), ashes, cinders, large fragments of solid rock, mud, water, steam, and various gases. Such openings are ordinarily surrounded by more or less conical accumulations of the erupted materials, and it is to such cones that the term volcano is usually applied.

The opening through which the lava rises is called the vent or chimney, and the cup-shaped enlargement of it, in its upper parts, the crater; there may be one such opening at the summit or on the flanks of the cone, or there may be a considerable number of them. In many volcanoes a central cone has upon its flanks a considerable number of minor cones (parasitic cones, as they are sometimes called). Etna has more than two hundred quite conspicuous cones within a radius of ten miles from the center of the main crater. The size and elevation of volcanoes vary greatly. The very high ones, like Cotopaxi and Popocatepetl and many others, are built up on high plateaus; others, like the extinct or dormant volcanoes of the Sierra Nevada of California, are chiefly made up of other than volcanic material, masked by the flow of eruptive matter down the slopes of a preexisting older mass.

Volcanoes and volcanic regions vary greatly in the degree of their activity and in the length and frequency of their periods of repose; those volcanoes which during the historic period have shown no signs of activity are said to be extinct, or dormant if a long interval has elapsed since the last eruption. Nothing definite was known of the volcanic forces pent up within the area covered by Vesuvius prior to A. D. 79, when the great catastrophe took place by which Pompeii was overwhelmed, and which was briefly described by Pliny the Younger in his narrative of the death of his uncle, Pliny the Elder. Volcanoes and volcanic areas are very irregularly distributed over the earth, but are chiefly in the neighborhood of the ocean. The Asiatic and the American shores of the Pacific—not continuously, but in many places—are dotted with volcanoes, from Japan to the islands of the Indian Ocean, and from Patagonia to Alaska. The most active volcanic center in the world is the island of Java and its vicinity. This island, having about the area of England, contains forty-nine great volcanic cones, some of which are 12,000 feet in height. The eruption of Krakatoa, an island in the Sunda Strait, which took place in the closing days of August, 1883, was the most violent and destructive event of the kind of which history has any record. Nearly forty thousand persons were drowned along the coast adjacent to the Strait of Sunda by waves set in motion by the inrush of water to fill the cavity caused by the expulsion of material from the crater.

2. A kind of fireworks. See *figgig*1, 2.—Submarine volcano. See submarine.—Volcano-ship, a vessel loaded with combustibles and missiles for explosion against another ship or against a stationary structure.

The burning volcano-ship at the siege of Antwerp.

Motley, Hist. Netherlands, II. 157.

volcanoism (vol-kā'nō-izm), n. [< volcano + -ism.] Violent and destructive eruptiveness. [Rare.]

Not blaze out, . . . as wasteful volcanoism, to scorch and consume! Carlyle, Past and Present, ii. 10.

volcanological (vol-kā'nō-loj'ī-kal), a. [< volcanology + -ical.] Relating to or in the manner of volcanology; in a scientific manner, from the point of view of the investigator of volcanic phenomena. Also vulcanological.

volcanology (vol-kā'nol'ō-jī), n. [< volcano + Gr. -λογία; < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific study of volcanic phenomena. Also vulcanology.

His annual account of the progress in volcanology and seismology for 1855.

Athenæum, No. 3068, p. 210.

vole1 (vōl), n. [< F. vole, < voler, fly, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] In card-playing, a winning of all the tricks played in one deal.

Ladies, I'll venture for the vole.

Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

"A vole! a vole!" she cried, "'tis fairly won;
My game is ended, and my work is done." Crabbe.

vole1 (vōl), v. i.; pret. and pp. voled, pp. voling. [*< vole*1, n.] In card-playing, to win all the tricks played in one deal.

vole2 (vōl), n. [Short for vole-mouse.] A short-tailed field-mouse or meadow-mouse; a campagnol or arvicoline; any member of the genus Arvicola in a broad sense. All the Arvicolinae are voles, though some of them, as the lemming and muskrat, are usually called by other names. They are mostly terrestrial, tending to be aquatic, abound in the sphagnum swamps and low moist ground of nearly all parts of the northern hemisphere, and are on the whole among the most mischievous of mammals. The common vole, meadow-mouse, or short-tailed field-mouse of Europe is A. agrestis.

Common European Meadow vole (Arvicola agrestis).

The water-vole or water-rat is a larger species, A. amphibius, almost as aquatic as a muskrat. Some voles are widely distributed, among them one common to the northern parts of both hemispheres, the red-backed vole, Eutamias rutilus. The commonest representatives in the United States are Arvicola riparius, A. custeri, and A. pinetorum. A very large species of British America is A. xanthognatha. The name vole is purely British, being seldom heard in the United States, or used in books treating of the American species, which are called field-mice and meadow-mice. See also Cuts under Arvicola, Eutamias, Synaptomys, and water-rat.

volently (vō'lent-li), adv. Willingly. [Rare.]

Into the pit they run against their will that ran so volently, so volently, to the brink of it.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 237.

volery (vol'e-ri), n.; pl. voleries (-ri). [Also volary, volary; < OF. voliere, a cage, coop, dove-cote, F. volière, an aviary, also OF. volier, a large cage or aviary; cf. volerie, "a place over the stage which we called the heaven" (Cotgrave), i. e. 'place of flying'; < voler, fly, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] 1. A large bird-cage or inclosure in which the birds have room to fly.

I thought thee then our Orpheus, that wouldst try,
Like him, to make the air one volary.

B. Jonson, Underwoods, xvi.

Sitting moping like three or four melancholy Birds in a spacious Volary.

Etherege, Man of Mode, v.

Having seen the roomes, we went to y<sup>e</sup> volary, w<sup>ch</sup> has a cupola in the middle of it, greete trees and bushes, it being full of birds, who drank at two fountains.

Evelyn, Diary, March 1, 1644.

2. The birds confined in such an inclosure; a flight or flock of birds.

An old boy, at his first appearance, . . . is sure to draw on him the eyes and chirping of the whole town volery, amongst which there will not be wanting some birds of prey.

Locke, Education, § 94.

volet (vol'ā), n. [OF. volet, a cloth spread on the ground to hold grain, a shutter, etc., < voler, fly, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] 1. A veil, especially one worn by women, and forming a part of the outdoor dress in the middle ages.—2. In painting, one of the wings or shutters of a picture formed as a triptych, as in Rubens's "Descent from the Cross" in Antwerp Cathedral, the volets of which are painted on both sides.

Small triptychs with folding-doors or volets in box-wood.

S. K. Cat. Spec. Exh. 1862, No. 1042.

3. A door, or one leaf of a door, in ornamental furniture and similar decorative objects.

volget, n. [< L. vulgus, vulgus, the common people: see vulgar.] The vulgar; the rabble.

One had as good be dumb as not speak with the volge.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., XI. viii. 32. (Darwin.)

volitable (vol'i-tā-bl), a. [< L. volitare, fly to and fro: see volitant.] Capable of being volatilized; volatilizable.

volitant (vol'i-tant), a. [< L. volitan(t)-s, pp. of volitare, fly to and fro, freq. of volare, fly: see volant.] Flying; having the power of flight; volant: as, the bat is a volitant quadruped.

Volitantia (vol-i-tan'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of volitan(t)-s, flying: see volitant.] In Illiger's classification of mammals (1811), the eleventh order, containing flying quadrupeds in two families, Dermoptera and Chiroptera, or Volitores (volit, volare, to fly; NL, prop. "flying") In this group, the wings are placed far back on the body, and the wing bones are very strong. They are usually the fastest fliers in the air.

volower (vol'ō-er), n. One who baptizes.
Volscian (vol'shian), a. and n. [L. Volsci, the Volseians; see II., 1.] I. a. Pertaining to the Volseians.

trines or philosophy of Voltaire; specifically, the incredulity or skepticism, especially in regard to revealed Christianity, often attributed to Voltaire.

He interprets Voltaireanism as "a school based on de-

Voltairism (vol-târ'izm), n. [< Voltaire (see def.) + -ism.] The principles or practice of Voltaire; skepticism; infidelity.

In Luther's own country Protestantism soon dwindled into a rather barren affair, . . . the essence of it sceptical contention; which indeed has jaunted more and more down to Voltairism.

Carlyle, Heroes, iv.

voltairism (vol-târ'izm), n. [< Volta (see def.) + -ism.] That branch of electrical science which discusses the production of an electric current by the chemical action between dissimilar metals immersed in a liquid. It is so named from the Italian physicist Volta, whose experiments contributed greatly to the establishment of this branch of science. See volt.

voltaité (vol-tâ'it), n. [< Volta (see voltaité) + -ité.] In minéral., a hydrous sulphate of iron, occurring in isometric crystals of a green to black color: first found at the solfatara near Naples.

voltammeter (vol-tam'e-têr), n. [Irreg. < voltaic + -mètre.] An electrolytic cell arranged for quantitative measurement of the amount of decomposition produced by the passage through it of an electric current, and hence used as an indirect means of measuring the strength of the current.

voltametric (vol-ta-met'rik), a. Pertaining to or involving the use of a voltammeter: as, voltametric measurement.

volt-ammeter (vôlt'am'e-têr), n. 1. A combination of a volt-meter and a transformer, for the measurement of alternating currents. The secondary or thick-wire coil of the transformer is included in the circuit through which the current passes, while the primary or thin-wire coil is closed through the volt-meter. 2. An instrument which can be used for measuring either volts or amperes.

volt-ampere (vôlt'am-pâr'), n. The rate of working or activity in an electric circuit when the electromotive force is one volt and the current one ampere; a watt.

voltaplast (vôlt'â-plâst), n. [< voltaic + Gr. πλαστικός, verbal adj. of πλασσειν, mold.] A kind of voltaic battery used in electrotyping.

Volta's pile. See battery, 8 (b).

Volta's pistol. See pistol.

voltatype (vôlt'â-tip), n. [< voltaic + Gr. τυπώ, type: see type.] Same as electrotype.

volt-coulomb (vôlt'kô-lô'm'), n. Same as joule.

volte, n. Plural of volta.

volti (vôl'ti), v. [It., impv. of voltare, turn, < L. volvere, pp. volutus, turn: see roll, volve.] In music, same as verte.—Volti subito. See verte subito.

voltiger (vôlt'i-jêr), n. [< F. voltiger, a leaper: see voltiger.] Same as voltigeur.

The voltiger of Ferrara was but as an ape compared to him. He was singularly skilful in leaping nimbly from one horse to another without putting foot to ground, and these horses were called desultories.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 23.

voltigeur (vol-ti-zhêr'), n. [F., < voltiger, < It. volteggiare, vault, < volta, a turn, volt: see volt.] 1. A leaper; a vaulter.—2. Formerly, in France, a member of a light-armed picked company, placed on the left of a battalion; under the second empire, a member of one of several special infantry regiments.

voltite (vôl'tit), n. In elect., an insulating material consisting of a mixture of a specially prepared gelatin with resin-oil, oxidized linseed-oil, resin, and paraffin.

volt-meter (vôlt'mê'têr), n. An electrometer, or a high-resistance galvanometer, or a galvanometer combined with a resistance calibrated so that its indications show the number of volts E. M. F. in the circuit between its terminals. The cut shows one form of volt-meter, for the construction of which see ampere-meter.

voltot, n. [It.: see vault.] A vault.

Entering the church, admirable is the breadth of the voltot or roof.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 19, 1644.

Voltolini's disease. A disease of childhood, characterized by cerebral symptoms, and followed by permanent deafness.

Volt-meter.

Voltzia (volt'si-ä), n. [NL., named after P. L. VOLTZ (1785-1840), a French mining engineer.] The generic name given by Brongniart (1828) to a fossil plant which first appeared in the Permian, and found also, in several localities, in the various divisions of the European Trias, and in rocks of the same age in India. Voltzia belongs to the Coniferae, and is placed by Schenk among the Taxodioxes. It is a tree of considerable height, resembling Aracaria in general appearance, but having a fructification analogous to that of the Taxodioxes. The fossils called Cyclopteris Liebenii by Geinitz are considered by Kidston as being, in all probability, the bracts of a cone of Voltzia. The Glyptolepis of Schimper and the Glyptolepidium of Heer were also (in 1884) placed by Schenk under Voltzia.

voltzine (volt'sin), n. [< Voltz (see Voltzia) + -ine.] A rose-red, yellowish, or brownish opaque or subtranslucent mineral, occurring in implanted spherical globules with thin lamellar structure. It is an oxysulphid of zinc.

voltzite (volt'sit), n. [< Voltz (see Voltzia) + -ite.] Same as voltzine.

volubilate (vol'ü-bi-lât), a. [< L. volubilis, turning (see voluble) + -ate.] In bot., twining; voluble.

voluble (vol'ü-bil), a. [Formerly also volubil; < L. volubilis, whirling, that is turned round: see voluble.] 1. Same as voluble, 1.

This less volubil earth, By shorter flight to the east, had left him there.

Milton, P. L., iv. 504.

2. In bot., same as voluble, 4. Encyc. Brit., IV. 95.

volubility (vol'ü-bil'i-ti), n. [< F. volubilité, < L. volubilitas], a rapid whirling motion, fluency (of speech), < volubilis, whirling, voluble: see voluble.] 1. The state or character of being voluble in speech; excessive fluency or readiness in speaking; unchecked flow of talk.

A laquety that runs on errands for him, and can whisper a light message to a loose wench with some round volubility.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, i. 1.

He (the emperor) first attacked Cardinal Fesch, and singularly enough, launched forth with uncommon volubility into a discussion on ecclesiastical principles and usages, without possessing the slightest notion, either historical or theological, of the subject.

Memoirs of Talleyrand, in The Century, XLI. 701.

2. A rolling or revolving; aptness to roll; revolution; hence, mutability.

Then celestial spheres should forget their wonted motions, and by irregular volubility turn themselves any way, as it might happen.

Hooker.

Volubility of human affairs.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

voluble (vol'ü-bl), a. [< F. voluble = Sp. voluble = Pg. volubel = It. volubile, < L. volubilis, that turns around, whirling, fluent (of speech), < volvere, pp. volutus, turn round or about: see volve.] 1. Formed so as to roll with ease, or to be easily turned or set in motion; apt to roll; rolling; rotating; revolving.

The most excellent of all the figures Geometrical is the round for his many perfections. First because he is even and smooth, without any angle or interruption, most voluble and apt to turn, and to continue motion, which is the author of life. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 81.

Yeares, like a ball, are voluble, and run;

Houres, like false Vowes, no sooner spoke than done.

Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 141).

Would you like to hear yesterday's sermon over and over again—eternally voluble? Thackeray, Philip, xvii.

2. Characterized by a great flow of words or by glibness of utterance; speaking with plausible fluency: as, a voluble politician.

Cassio, . . . a knave very voluble.

Shak., Othello, ii. 1. 242.

A man's tongue is voluble, and pours Words out of all sorts ev'ry way. Such as you speak you hear.

Chapman, Iliad, xx. 228.

If a man hath a voluble Tongue, we say, He hath the gift of Prayer.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 90.

[Formerly it might be used of readiness and ease in speaking without the notion of excess.

It [speech] ought to be voluble vpon the tongue, and tunable to the eare.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie (ed. Arber), p. 168.

He [Archbishop Abbot] was painful, stout, severe against bad manners, of a grave and voluble eloquence.

Ep. Hackel, Abp. Williams, i. 65. (Trench.)]

3. Changeable; mutable.

He . . . almost puts Faith in a fever, and deifies alone

Voluble chance.

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 2.

4. In bot., of a twining habit; rising spirally around a support, as the hop.

volubleness (vol'ü-bl-nes), n. The character of being voluble; volubility.

volubly (vol'ü-bli), adv. In a voluble or fluent manner.

"O Gods," said he, "how volubly doth talk This eating gulf!"

Chapman, Odyssey, xviii. 41.

Fallacies which, when set down on paper, are at once detected, pass for unanswerable arguments when dexterously and volubly urged in Parliament, at the bar, or in private conversation.

Macaulay, History.

Volucella (vol-ü-sel'ü), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1764), < L. volucris, fitted for flight: see Volucres.] A notable genus of syrphid flies, some of them mimicking bumblebees in general appearance, and parasitic, in the larval state, upon the larvæ of these bees and in the nests of wasps. Forty-five species are known in North America, and seven in Europe.

Volucres (vol'ü-krez), n. pl. [NL., < L. volucer or volucris, fitted for flight, winged, volitorial; as a noun, a bird: < volare, fly: see volant.] 1. In C. L. Bonaparte's classification of birds (1850), the first tribe of the third order of Passeres, embracing those lower Passeres which form Sundevall's scutelliplantar division of that order, together with all the picarian birds. It is an artificial group, insusceptible of definition, and corresponds exactly with no recognized group or groups; on the whole it agrees best with Picariæ as commonly accepted.

2. In C. J. Sundevall's classification, the second order of birds, agreeing in the main with the Picariæ as commonly understood, but including the parrots and pigeons. It is most nearly a synonym of the old Picæ of Linnæus. [Rare in both senses.]

volucrine (vol'ü-krin), a. [< L. volucris, a bird, + -ine.] Pertaining to birds; bird-like.

The volucrine clamor continued unabated, and when I came downstairs I was not surprised at the sight that awaited me. The passage was filled with bird-cages.

P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 349.

volume (vol'üm), n. [< F. volume = Sp. volumen = Pg. It. volume, < L. volumen (volumin-), a roll (as of a manuscript), < volvere, pp. volutus, roll round or about: see voluble.] 1. A written document (as of parchment, papyrus, or strips of bark) rolled up in a convenient form for keeping or use, such being anciently the prevailing form of the book; a roll; a scroll.

Volume of the ancient type.

Pentateuch of the Samaritans, used in their Synagogue at Shechem.

The written sheets were usually wound around a stick, termed an umbilicus, the extremities of which were called the cornua, to which a label containing the name of the author was tied. The whole was placed in a wrapper, and frequently anointed with oil of cedarwood as a preservative against insects.

In the volume [roll, R. V.] of the book it is written.

Heb. x. 7.

In history a great volume is unrolled for our instruction.

Burke, Rev. in France.

Hence—2. A collection of written or printed sheets bound together, whether containing a single complete work, a part of a work, or more than one separate work; a book; a tome; as, a large volume; a work in six volumes.

He furnish'd me

From mine own library with volumes.

Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 167.

They [men] cannot extinguish those lively characters of the power, wisdom, and goodness of God which are every where to be seen in the large volume of the Creation.

Stillington, Sermons, I. iii.

An odd volume of a set of books bears not the value of its proportion to the set.

Franklin.

it and the cause, without intervention of the reason and the will: spontaneous applause seems to start of itself. Willing has in the authorized version of the Bible a range of meaning up to desirous or anxious, as in Mat. i. 19, xxvi. 41. Luke x. 29. but now is strictly confined to the negative sense of consenting, or not refusing or objecting, in regard to the wish of another.

Some of the pleasantest recollections of my childhood are connected with the voluntary study of an ancient Bible which belonged to my grandmother.

Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 54.

Spontaneous joys, where nature has its play.

The soul adopts, and owns their first-born sway.

Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 256.

He lent a willing ear to the artful propositions of Sforza.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 1.

II. n.; pl. voluntaries (-riz). 1. One who engages in any affair of his own choice or free will; a volunteer.

Rash, inconsiderate, fiery voluntaries.

With ladies' faces and fierce dragons' spleens.

Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 67.

Specifically—2. Eccles., in Great Britain, one who maintains the doctrine of the mutual independence of the church and the state, and holds that the church should be supported by the voluntary contributions of its members and should be left entirely free to regulate its affairs.—3. Any work or performance not imposed by another.

At school he [Wordsworth] wrote some task-verses on subjects imposed by the master, and also some voluntaries of his own, equally undistinguished by any peculiar merit.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 206.

4. In church music, an organ prelude to a service; sometimes, by extension, an interlude or postlude; also, an anthem or other piece of choir-music, especially at the opening of a service. These uses of the word seem to have originated in the fact that such musical exercises are not rubrically prescribed.

The rich may indulge in superfluities. The Ionian muse is somewhat too fond of playing voluntaries.

Lauder, Imag. Conv., Virgilus and Horatius.

My dear Herr Capellmeister, they say you play the most exquisite voluntaries! Now do play us one.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 4.

At voluntary†, voluntarily; by an effort of will.

Y'cees cuppes were too strong for all antidotes, and womens flatteries too forceable to resist at voluntarie.

Greene, Never Too Late (Works, ed. Dyce, Int., p. xii.).

voluntary† (vol'un-tā-ri), adv. [< voluntary, a.] Voluntarily.

Gold, amber, yvorie, perles, owches, rings,

And all that els was pretious and deare,

The sea unto him voluntary brings.

Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 23.

I serve here voluntary, Shak., T. and C., ii. 1. 103.

voluntaryism (vol'un-tā-ri-izm), n. [< voluntary + -ism.] Voluntary principle or action; the system or principle of supporting anything by voluntary contribution or assistance; especially, the principle of unrestricted personal liberty in matters of religion—this involving on the one hand the obligation of church-members to support and maintain religious ordinances, and on the other the church's entire freedom from state patronage, support, and control.

Esther . . . was unable at present to give her mind to the original functions of a bishop, or the comparative merits of Endowments and Voluntaryism.

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xli.

The transatlantic friend of Vane, at the very nick of time, was the central champion in England of absolute voluntaryism, against the Independents and the famous fifteen proposals for a State Church on their sort of "Christian Fundamentals."

N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 541.

In education, voluntaryism has been most prominent and most beneficent from early times.

Jour. of Education, XVIII. 148.

voluntaryist (vol'un-tā-ri-ist), n. [< voluntary + -ist.] One who believes in or advocates voluntaryism, especially in religion. [Rare.]

We commend this tribute to the Church of England to our friends on the other side of the water, as proof that an American and a Voluntaryist can yet do full justice to that ancient and historical church.

New York Evangelist, Oct. 19, 1876.

voluntative (vol'un-tā-tiv), a. [< L. voluntat(-s), will, + -ive.] Voluntary.

The simple solution seems to be that the conditioning of a purpose destroys its absolute voluntative power.

Amer. Jour. Philol., IV. 425.

voluntet, n. See volunté.

volunteer (vol-un-tēr'), n. and a. [< F. volontaire, now volontaire = Sp. Pg. It. volontario, < L. voluntarius, voluntary; see voluntary.] 1. A person who enters into any service of his own free will.

He has had Compassion upon Lovers, and generously engaged a Volunteer in this Action, for our Service.

Congress, Way of the World, v. 14.

2. A person who enters military service of his own free will, and not by constraint or compulsion; one who offers to serve, and generally receives some consideration or privileges on that account; in the United States, especially during the civil war, a soldier of a body other than the regular army, but practically governed by the same laws when in service. In Great Britain the government provides the various bodies of volunteers, or citizen-soldiers, with competent instructors, arms, and a part of their ammunition, besides allowing to each corps certain grants proportioned to the number of efficient members, etc. A British volunteer can resign on giving a fortnight's notice, except in a crisis of imminent danger to the country. In the United States the army of volunteers comprises, to all intents and purposes—(1) the regular unpaid forces of State militia which, when called into the actual service of the United States, receive pay from the government, and are subject to the rules and articles of war, and (2) that class of troops which may from time to time be raised by Congress on occasions of national emergency. Such troops are properly United States troops, and the method of officering them is designated by Congress.

At the very outset of the campaign, the inexperience of the Federal volunteers was made evident, even more on the march than on the battle-field.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), I. 193.

Volunteers often complain that they are not taken seriously enough. . . . Nor must they ever cease complaining until they have been thoroughly organized for whatever their duties are to be, and until those duties are perfectly clear to themselves and the country at large.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 615.

3. In law, one who claims the benefit of a contract or conveyance although no consideration proceeded from him nor from any one in whose place he stands.—4. A tree which grows spontaneously; as, that pear-tree in my garden is a volunteer. [Southern U. S.]

II. a. 1. Entering into military service by free will and choice; as, a volunteer soldier.—2. Composed of volunteers: as, a volunteer corps.

The volunteer artillery, furnished by the several States, was only organized into batteries, having no officer above the rank of captain.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), I. 275.

volunteer (vol-un-tēr'), v. [< volunteer, n.] 1. trans. To offer, contribute, or bestow voluntarily, or without constraint or compulsion.

The chief agents who had already volunteered their services against him.

Gifford, Note on B. Jonson's Poetaster, iii. 1.

Bit by bit, the full and true

Particulars of the tale were volunteered

With all the breathless zeal of friendship.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 232.

II. intrans. To enter into any service of one's free will, without constraint or compulsion: as, to volunteer for a campaign.

volunteerly† (vol-un-tēr'li), adv. Voluntarily; as a volunteer.

Volunteerly to ramble with Lord Loudon Campbell,

Brave Ilay did suffer for a'.

Battle of Sheriff-Muir (Child's Ballads, VII. 158).

voluntomotory (vol'un-tō-mō'tō-ri), a. [< vol-unt(ary) + motory.] Having or pertaining to motor influence or effect which is voluntary, or subject to the will: with Remak specifying the somatopleural division of the body, including the muscular system of ordinary language, as distinguished from the splanchnopleural or involuntomotory (which see).

The voluntomotory, corresponding to the body-wall or somatopleure.

Encyc. Brit., VIII. 167.

lupt.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining or contributing to luxury and sensual pleasure; promoting sensual indulgence.

The arts which flourish in times while virtue is in growth are military, and while virtue is in state are liberal, and while virtue is in declination are voluptuary.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

The works of the voluptuary arts are properly attributed to Vulcan, the God of Fire.

Bacon, Physical Fables, ii., Expl.

2. Given to sensual indulgence; voluptuous: as, voluptuary habits.

II. n.; pl. voluptuaries (-riz). A man given up to luxury or the gratification of the appetite and other sensual indulgences; a sensualist.

Does not the voluptuary understand, in all the liberties of a loose and lewd conversation, that he runs the risk of body and soul?

Sir R. L'Estrange.

The parable was intended against the voluptuaries of that time, . . . men who, notwithstanding they professed themselves Jews, lived like Heathens.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xii.

We have the Voluptuary, when first pleasant feelings, and secondly the pleasantness of pleasant feelings, are made the end to which all else is means, and the abstraction of pleasure's sake is pursued.

F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 253, note.

voluptuate† (vō-lup'tū-āt), v. t. [< L. voluptu(ous) + -ate†.] To make luxurious or delightful.

Von Graefe's operation for cataract. See operation.

Von Patera process. See process.

voodoo (vō-dō'), n. and a. [Also voudou; < creole F. vaudoux, a negro sorcerer, prob. orig. a dial. form of F. Vaudois, a Waldensian (the Waldenses, as heretics, being accused of sorcery): see Waldenses. Cf. hoodoo.] I. n. 1. A common name among creoles and in many of the southern United States for any practitioner of malicious, defensive, amatory, healing, or soothsaying enchantments, charms, witchcrafts, or secret rites, especially when they are tinged with African superstitions and customs; especially, one who makes such practices a business.

The unprotected little widow should have had a very serious errand to bring her to the voodoo's house. G. W. Cable, Grandissimes, p. 90.

Every one has read of the noisy antics employed by the medicine-men among the Indians, and by the fetch-doctors and voodoos among the negroes, for driving diseases out of their patients. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 803.

2. The same title transferred by voodoos to a personal evil spirit supreme among evil powers.

But for the small leaven of more intelligent whites, the black people would soon be victims of voodoo. Indeed, it is hard to find a rural community in the South where that dreadful bugbear is not more or less believed in and feared. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 44.

3. pl. The practitioners of voodoo rites as a collective body.

II. a. Pertaining to or associated with the superstitions and peculiar practices of the voodoos: as, a voodoo dance (a violent indecent dance belonging to the secret nocturnal ceremonies of the voodoos); a voodoo doctor, or voodoo priest (the terms most commonly used in creole countries for any professional voodoo); voodoo king or queen (the person who, by a certain vague election and tenure, holds for life a local preëminence and some slight authority over all voodoos of the surrounding country).

voodoo (vō-dō'), v. t. [Also voudou; < voodoo, n. Cf. hoodoo, v.] To affect by voodoo conjuration or charms.

What was the matter with her head, anyhow? She must be voodooed. New Princeton Rev., I. 106.

The negroes [of Louisiana] took a dislike to the overseer, and sent to the city for a conjuror to come down and voodoo him. The conjuror undertook to rid them of the overseer for $30, but finally came down in his demand to $2.50. The Century, XXXV. 112.

voodooism (vō-dō'izm), n. [Also voudouism; < voodoo + -ism.] The voodoo superstitions and practices. In the main these are only such fantastical beliefs and impotent secret libations, burnings, etc., as are everywhere the recourse of base and puerile conditions of mind. There seems to be little in voodooism to justify the term "worship"; and still less does it seem to contain any group of beliefs, myths, or pious observances that make it in any sense a separate religion.

vooga-hole (vō'ga-höl), n. Same as vug.

voracious (vō-rā'shus), a. [= F. vorace = Sp. Pg. voraz = It. vorace, < L. vorax (vorax), swallowing greedily, ravenous, < vorare, swallow, devour; cf. Gr. √ βορ in βορᾶ, food, βορῆα, food (see broma), βιβόσκειν, eat, Skt. √ gar, swallow. Cf. vorant, devour.] 1. Greedy in eating; eating food in large quantities; marked by voracity; ravenous: as, a voracious man.

I have seen of the king carrion crows, . . . They are very voracious, and will despatch a carcass in a trice.

Dampier, Voyages, an. 1676.

They are men of a voracious appetite, but no taste. Addison, Spectator, No. 452.

2. Rapacious.

I would have removed this defect, and formed no voracious or destructive animals, which only prey on the other parts of the creation. Goldsmith, Asern.

Confess to me, as the first proof of it [confidence], didst thou never shrink back from so voracious and intractable a monster as that accursed snake?

Landon, Imag. Conv., Alexander and the Priest of [Hammon].

3. Ready to swallow up: as, a voracious gulf or whirlpool. = Syn. 1. Ravenous, etc. See rapacious. voraciously (vō-rā'shus-li), adv. In a voracious manner; with greedy appetite; ravenously; rapaciously.

voraciousness (vō-rā'shus-nes), n. The state or character of being voracious; greediness of appetite; ravenousness; voracity.

This necessarily puts the good man upon making great ravages on all the dishes . . . near him, and distinguishing himself by a voraciousness of appetite, as knowing that his time is short. Addison, Tatler, No. 255.

voracity (vō-ras'i-ti), n. [F. voracité = Sp. voracidad = Pg. voracidade = It. voracità, < L. voracitas (-s), ravenousness, < vorax (vorax), devouring: see voracious.] The character of being voracious; greediness of appetite; voraciousness.

He ate food with what might almost be termed voracity. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, vii.

= Syn. Avidity, ravenousness. See rapacious.

voraginous (vō-raj'i-nus), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. voraginoso, < LL. voraginosus, full of chasms or abysses, < L. vorago, a chasm, abyss: see vorago.] Of or pertaining to a gulf or whirlpool; hence, devouring; swallowing. [Rare.]

A cavern's jaws voraginous and vast.

Mallet, Amynor and Theodora, i.

vorago (vō-rā'gō), n. [L., a gulf, abyss, < vorare, swallow, swallow up. Cf. E. swallow, a gulf, abyss; cf. also gorge in similar sense.] A gulf; an abyss. [Rare.]

From hence we passed by the place into which Curtius precipitated himself for the love of his country, now without any sign of a lake or vorago.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 4, 1644.

vorant (vō'rant), a. [L. vorant (-t-s), pp. of vorare, swallow: see voracious.] In her-, devouring or swallowing: noting a serpent or other creature of prey. The epithet is followed by the name of the object which is being swallowed: as, the arms of Visconti of Milan were a serpent vorant a child.

vormela, n. See vomela.

-vorous, [L. vorus, < vorare, devour: see voracious, vorant.] The terminal element, meaning 'eating,' of various compound adjectives, as carnivorous, herbivorous, insectivorous, omnivorous, piscivorous, etc.

vortex (vōr'teks), n.; pl. vortices or vortexes (vōr'ti-séz, vōr'tek-sez). [= Sp. vórtice = Pg. It. vortice, < L. vortex, var. vertex, a whirl, eddy, whirlpool, vortex: see vertex, another form of the word.] 1. A whirl of fluid. An intuitive geometrical idea of the motion is not easily attained. If the motion of a fluid varies continuously both in time and in space, it may be described as such that each spherical particle is at each instant receiving three compressions or elongations at right angles to one another, and has, besides, a motion of translation and a motion of rotation about an axis through it. When this motion of rotation is present, the fluid is said to have a rotational motion; but this must not be confounded with a rotation of the whole mass. Thus, if all the parts of the fluid move in one direction but with unequal velocities in different parallel planes, though there be no rotation of the whole mass, yet the motion is rotational; and if a spherical particle were suddenly congealed, its inertia would make it rotate. On the other hand, one or more radial paddles turning about the axis of a cylindrical vessel filled with a perfect fluid, though making the latter revolve as a whole, could yet impart no rotational motion, which the fluid would evade by slipping round between the paddles. The motion being perfectly continuous, the axis of rotation of a particle must join the axis of rotation of a neighboring particle, so that a curve, called a vortex-line, may be described whose tangents are the axes of rotation of the particles at their points of tangency; and

It is of no use to vote down gravitation or morals.
Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

To vote in, to choose by suffrage; elect, as to an appointment or office, by expression of will or preference: as, he was voted in by a handsome majority.

voteless (vō'tles), a. [< vote + -less.] Having no vote; not entitled to a vote.

He was not enlightened enough to know that there was a way of using voteless miners and natives at Nominations and Elections.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, xi.

voter (vō'tēr), n. [< vote + -er.] One who votes or has a legal right to vote; an elector.

Of late years . . . when it has been considered necessary by politicians to cultivate the foreign-born voters, there has been a great tendency to appoint naturalized citizens as consuls.
Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 81.

Registration of voters. See registration.

vote-recorder (vō'tē-rē-kōr'dēr), n. An electrical device which records the yea or nay of a voter when the corresponding knob or button is pressed.

voting-paper (vō'ting-pā'pēr), n. A balloting-paper; particularly, according to the British Ballot Act of 1872, a paper used in voting by ballot in the election of members of Parliament, of municipal corporations, etc. Such papers are used only in cases where the number of candidates exceeds the number of vacancies; they contain a list of the candidates, and the voter is required to put a mark opposite the name of each candidate he selects.

voteist (vō'tist), n. [< L. votum, vow. + -ist.] One who makes a vow; a vower; a votarist.

Try
If a poor woman, voteist of revenge,
Would not perform it.
Chapman, Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois, iii. 1.

votive (vō'tiv), a. [< F. votif = Sp. Pg. It. votivo, < L. votivus, of or pertaining to a vow, conformable to one's wish, < votum, vow: see vote, vow.] 1. Offered, contributed, or consecrated in accordance with a vow: as, a votive picture.

Not gold, not blood, their altar dowers,
But votive tears and symbol flowers.
Shelley, Hellas.

We set to-day a votive stone,
That memory may their dead redeem,
When, like our sires, our sons are gone.
Emerson, Concord Monument.

Votive tablets commemorative of cures and deliverance were hung around.

C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 232.

2. Observed, practised, or done in consequence of a vow. [Rare.]

Votive abstinence some cold constitutions may endure.
Feltham, Resolves, i. 85.

Diversions of this kind have a practical value, even though they seem to be those of a knight tilting at a way-side tournament as he rides on his votive quest.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 399.

Votive mass. See mass.—Votive offering, a tablet, picture, or the like dedicated in fulfillment of the vow (Latin ex voto) of a worshiper. Among the Greeks and Romans such offerings were dedicated to deities or heroes, and were affixed to the walls of temples, or set up in consecrated places, often in niches cut in the rock in a locality reputed sacred. Among Roman Catholics they are usually set up in chapels dedicated to the Virgin or to a saint.

votively (vō'tiv-lī), adv. In a votive manner; by vow.

votiveness (vō'tiv-nes), n. The state or character of being votive.

votress (vō'tres), n. Same as votaress.

vouch (vouch), v. [< ME. vouchen, vouchen, < OF. voucher, cocher, < L. vocare, call, call upon, summon: see vocation, voice. Cf. vouchsafe, avouch.] 1. trans. 1†. To call to witness.

And vouch the silent stars, and conscious moon.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xiii. 22.

2. To declare; assert; affirm; attest; avouch. Praised therefore be his name, which voucheth us worthy this honour.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 176.
What can you vouch against him, Signior Lucio?
Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 326.

What we have done
None shall dare vouch, though it be truly known.
Shelley, Revolt of Islam, ix. 31.

3. To warrant; be surety for; answer for; make good; confirm.

Go tell the lords of the city I am here;
Deliver them this paper; having read it,
Bid them repair to the market-place, where I,
Even in theirs and in the commons' ears,
Will vouch the truth of it.
Shak., Cor., v. 6. 5.

When I arrived at Scutari, they took my slave from me, as I had not the original writing by me to vouch the property of him. Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 126.

4. To support; back; second; follow up. [Rare.]

Bold words vouch'd with a deed so bold.
Milton, P. L., v. 66.

5. In law: (a) To produce vouchers for, in support of a charge in account. (b) In old Eng. law, to call or summon into court to warrant and defend, or to make good a warranty of title.

He vouches the tenant in tail, who vouches over the common voucher.
Blackstone, Com., II. xxi.

= Syn. 2. To asseverate, aver, protest.

II. intrans. To bear witness; give testimony or attestation; more specifically, in old Eng. law, to call in some one to make good his alleged warranty of title; be surety or guaranty.

Vouch with me, heaven.
Shak., Othello, i. 3. 262.

The Salvo of Sir John Friendly's appearing at last, and vouching for Lord Foplington, won't mend the matter.
Jeremy Collier, Short View (ed. 1698), p. 215.

A very clear account, upon my word; and I dare swear the lady will vouch for every article of it.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 3.

To vouch to warranty, in old Eng. law, to call in a third person as a substituted defendant, to defend the title acquired from him. = Syn. Of vouch for, warrant, assure, guarantee.

vouch (vouch), n. [< vouch, v.] Approving or supporting warrant; confirmation; attestation.

Why in this woolvish toge should I stand here,
To beg of Hob and Dick, that do appear,
Their needless vouches?
Shak., Cor., ii. 3. 124.

vouchee (vou-ché'), n. [< vouch + -ee.] In law, the person who is vouched or summoned in a writ of right.

All trouble on this score was avoided by choosing as vouchee some one who notoriously had no lands to make recompense withal, and therefore was, as we now say, not worth powder and shot.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 31.

voucher (vou'chēr), n. [< vouch + -er.] 1. One who vouches, or gives attestation or confirmation; one who is surety for another.

He knows his own strength so well that he never dares praise anything in which he has not a French author for his voucher.
Addison, Tatler, No. 165.

Some banks will not take the accounts of persons introduced only by their own clerks, for fear they might be confederates in some scheme of fraud or plunder. Other and responsible vouchers are required.
Harper's Mag., LXXX. 468.

2. A book, paper, document, or stamp which serves to prove the truth of accounts, or to confirm and establish facts of any kind; specifically, a receipt or other written evidence of the payment of money.

The stamp is a mark, . . . and a public voucher, that a piece of such denomination is of such a weight.
Locke, Further Considerations concerning Raising the Value of Money.

He caused the accounts to be examined by the proper officer, who, after comparing every article with its voucher, certified them to be right.
Franklin, Autobiog., p. 260.

3. In old Eng. law: (a) The tenant in a writ of right; one who called in another to establish his warranty of title. In common recoveries there might be a single voucher or double vouchers. [Also written vouchor.] (b) The calling in of a person to vouch.—Double voucher, an incident in the alienation of land by the fiction of common recovery, where the owner was allowed to convey to a third person who, being sued, alleged that the former warranted the title, and he, being called to vouch for it, was allowed to allege that still another warranted it to him, the object being to bar contingent interests, etc.

vouchment (vouch'mēt), n. [< vouch + -ment.] A declaration or affirmation; a solemn assertion.

Their vouchment by their honour in that tryal is not an oath.
Ep. Hackett, Abp. Williams, i. 77. (Davies.)

voucher (vou'chōr), n. [< vouch + -or.] See voucher, 3 (a).

vouchsafe (vouch-sāf'), v.; pret. and pp. vouchsafed, ppr. vouchsafing. [< ME. vouchen safe, saf, sauf, prop. two words, lit. 'guarantee (as) safe'; < vouch + safe.] I. trans. 1†. To guarantee as safe; secure; assure.

That the quen be of-sent, sauf wol i fouche.
William of Palerme (E. E. T. S.), i. 4152.
So Philip is wild, on that wise we it take
As ge haf mad present, the kyng vouches it saue.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 260. (Richardson.)

2. To permit, grant, or bestow: sometimes with implied condescension: as, not to vouchsafe an answer.

I have assailed her with music, but she vouchsafes no notice.
Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 3. 45.

In your pardon, and the kiss vouchsafed me,
You did but point me out a fore-right way
To lead to certain happiness.
Massinger, Parliament of Love, iii. 3.

Sir, I must thank you for the Visit you vouchsafed me in this simple Cell.
Howell, Letters, ii. 69.

3†. To receive or accept by way of condescension.

There she sate, vouchsafing my cloak (then most gorgeous) under her.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, i.

Upon which better part our prayers come in,
If thou vouchsafe them. Shak., K. John, iii. 1. 294.

II. intrans. To permit; grant; condescend; deign; stoop.

Than he preyed devoutly to God, that he wold vouchsafe sauf to suffer him gon up.
Manderell, Travels, p. 149.

God vouchsafed sauf thurgh thee with us to acorde.
Chaucer, A. B. C., i. 27.

Vouchsafe, noble Lady, to accept this simple remembrance.
Spenser, Tears of the Muses, Ded.

vouchsafement (vouch-sāf'mēt), n. [< vouchsafe + -ment.] The act of vouchsafing, or that which is vouchsafed; a gift or grant in condescension. [Rare.]

Peculiar experiences being such vouchsafements to them, which God communicated to none but his chosen people.

Stillington, Sermons, I. viii.

voudou, voodooism. See voodoo, voodooism.

vouge (vōzh), n. Same as vouge.

vough, n. Same as vug.

voulge (vōzh), n. [< OF. voutge, vouge, vouge, F. vouge (ML. vanga), a hunting-spear, a lance; origin unknown.] A weapon consisting of a blade fitted on a long handle or staff, used by the foot-soldiers of the fourteenth century and later. It varied in form, resembling sometimes the fauchard, sometimes the war-scythe, sometimes the halberd, and was frequently like an ax the blade of which, with but slight projection, has great length in the direction of the staff, and is finished at the end in a sharp point.

vound, a. An unexplained word, perhaps a mistake for round, occurring in the following passage:

Though it were of no vounde stone.
Wrought with squyre and scantillon.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 7063.

vour, v. t. [*ME. vourer, < OF. *vourer, vorer, < L. vorare, devour, eat; cf. voracious, devour.*] To devour.

Thei whom the swerd deuoured [var. voured].
Wyclif, 2 Ki. [2 Sam.] xviii. 8.

vourer, n. A devourer.

Lo! a man deuouere, ether glotoun [var. vourer or glotoun].
Wyclif, Luke vii. 34.

vousoir (vō-swōr'), n. [*F.; cf. voussure, the curvature of a vault, prop. < *roussier, < L. L. as if *volutare, make round, < L. volutus, a rolling, < volvere, pp. volutus, roll: see volute.*] In arch., a stone in the shape of a truncated wedge, which forms part of an arch. The under sides of the vousoirs form the intrados or soffit of the arch, and the upper sides the extrados. The middle vousoir is often termed the keystone. See arch, 2.

vousoir (vō-swōr'), v. t. [< vousoir, n.] To form with vousoirs; construct by means of vousoirs.
Encyc. Brit., II. 387.

voutet, n. An obsolete form of vault 1.

voutret, vouturt, n. Obsolete forms of vulture.

vow (vou), n. [< ME. vow, < OF. vou, vo, veu, F. vœu = Sp. Pg. It. voto, a vow, < L. votum, a promise, dedication, vow, < uovere, promise, vow: see vote, n., of which vow is a doublet.] 1. A solemn promise; an engagement solemnly entered into. Specifically—(a) A kind of promissory oath made to God, or to some deity, to perform some act or dedicate to the deity something of value, often in the event of receiving something specially desired, such as success in an enterprise, deliverance from danger, or recovery from sickness: as, a vow to build an altar.

Would I were even the saint they make their vows to!
How easily I would grant!
Fletcher, Pilgrim, i. 2.

Forc'd Consecrations out of another mans Estate are no better than forc'd Vows, hateful to God who loves a cheerful giver.
Milton, Touching Hirelings.

A vow is a deliberate promise made to God in regard to something possessing superior goodness. To be valid, it must proceed from the free, deliberate will of one who, by age and social position, is capable of contracting a solemn obligation. It is to God alone that a vow is taken, and . . . it is an act of religion, or of divine worship. To vow to a saint means, in the minds of Catholics, to vow to God in honour of a saint.
Rom. Cath. Dict.

(b) A promise to follow out some line of conduct, or to consecrate or devote one's self wholly or in part for a longer or shorter time to some act or service; a pledge of fidelity or constancy: as, a marriage vow.

Forloose therefore
They are which fortunes doe by vowes deuize,
Sith each unto himselfe his life may fortuneize.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. ix. 30.

By all the vows that ever men have broke,
In number more than ever women spoke.
Shak., M. N. D., i. 1. 175.

Vouge of the end of the 14th century. (From Viollet le Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.")

Such was the routine of our journey, the day, generally speaking, being divided into six hours of rest and eighteen of labour. This almost incredible toil the voyageurs bore without a murmur, and generally with such a hilarity of spirit as few other men could sustain for a single forenoon.

Goce. Simpson, Journey Round the World, I. 22.

voyaging (voi'aj-ing), n. [Verbal n. of voyage, v.] The act or process of taking a voyage; a journey by water.

It is, in fact, a diary of the voyagings and residences of the ambassadors of Henry the Third.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 184.

V. P. An abbreviation of vice-president.

V-point (vé'point), n. The vertex of two or more diverging lines: as, the V-point of cirrus stripes.

vraisemblance (vrā-soñ-bloñs'), n. [F. < vrai, true, + semblance, appearance: see very and semblance, and cf. verisimilitude.] The appearance of truth; verisimilitude.

v. s. In music, an abbreviation of colti subito.

V. S. An abbreviation of veterinary surgeon.

vs. An abbreviation of versus.

V-shaped (vé'shāpt), a. Shaped like the letter V; like the two equal sides of an isosceles triangle; lambdoid.—V-shaped barometric depression, a region of low barometer enclosed by one or more V-shaped isobars, the point of the V, in the northern hemisphere, being usually directed toward the south. V-shaped depressions are often accompanied by characteristic squalls, technically called line-squalls.

v. t. The abbreviation, used in this work, of verb transitive.

V-threaded screw. See screw<sup>1</sup>.

V-tool (vé'töl), n. In joinery and carving, a cutting-tool having the cutting edge in two branches, making an impression like a letter V, a sort of angular gouge.

vue (vü), n. [OF., sight, view: see view.] The sight-opening of a helmet: same as aillière.

vug (vug), n. [Also cugh, vough, vooga; < Corn. vug, vugh, vugga, vooga, etc., a cave, cavern; cf. Corn. fogo, fojon, foi, a cave (= W. fian, a cave, den), Corn. hugo, googoo, ogoo, ogo (Jago), a cave, W. ogof, gogof, a cave.] In mining, a cavity; a hollow in a rock or in a lode. Vug is the miners' name for that which geologists more generally call a geode. See geode. Also called tick-hole, vooga-hole.

Quartz is very generally found lining the hollow spaces (vughs) in lodes. R. Hunt, British Mining, p. 486.

vuggy (vug'i), a. [< vug + -y<sup>1</sup>.] Of the nature of a vug; containing vugs.

vuidr, n. Same as voider.

Vulcan (vul'kan), n. [= F. Vulcan = Sp. Pg. Vulcano = It. Volcano, Vulcano, < L. Vulcanus, Vulcanus, Vulcan, the god of fire; cf. Skt. utka, a firebrand. Cf. volcano.] 1. In Rom. myth., the god of fire and the working of metals, and the patron of all handicraftsmen. Originally an independent deity, he became with the advance of time completely identified with the Greek Hephaestus. He was the son of Jupiter and Juno, or of Juno alone, and was born with deformed feet, though according to late myths his lameness came from his having been hurled down from heaven by Jupiter in a fit of anger. He was the divine artist, the creator of all that was beautiful as well as of all that was mechanically wonderful in the abodes of the gods. On earth various volcanoes, as Lemnos and Etna, were held to be his workshops, and the Cyclopes were his journeymen. He had the power of conferring life upon his creations, and was thus the author of Pandora and of the golden dogs of Alcinoüs. In art he was represented as a bearded man, usually with the short sleeveless or one-sleeved tunic (exomis) of the workman, with a conical cap, holding hammer and tongs or other attributes of the smith, and sometimes with indication of his lameness. When Jupiter conceived Minerva in his head, the goddess was delivered full-armed, upon the stroke of an ax in the hands of Vulcan.

2. A hypothetical planet between the sun and the planet Mercury. An object supposed to be a planet was seen crossing the sun's disk on March 26th, 1859. The period of revolution assigned to it was something over 19 days, and its distance from the sun was estimated at about 13,000,000 miles. The existence of Vulcan, however, has not been confirmed (may, indeed, be said to have been practically disproved) by subsequent careful observations.

3†. A volcano.

Also in that Ile is the Mount Ethna, that Men clepen Mount Gybelle; and the Wleanes, that ben evermore brennyng. Mandeville, Travels, p. 55.

Of those [remarkable things] which are in the Vulcans and mouths of fire at the Indies, worthy doubtless to be observed, I will speake in their order.

Acosta, Hist. Indies (tr. by E. Grimston, 1604), iii. 2 [(Hakluyt Soc., I. 105).

Vulcan powder, an explosive consisting of nitroglycerin, sodium nitrate, sulphur, and charcoal.

Vulcanalia (vul-ka-nā'li-ä), n. pl. [L.: see Vulcan.] An ancient Roman festival in honor of Vulcan, celebrated on August 23d with games in the Flaminian circus near the temple of the god, and with sacrifices of fishes. As part of the observance on this day, work was begun by lamplight, in honor of the fire-god.

Vulcanian (vul-ka'ni-an), a. [< L. Vulcanius, Vulcanus, < Vulcanus, Vulcanus, Vulcan, + -an.] 1. Pertaining to Vulcan, or to works in iron, etc., and occasionally (but not so used by geologists) to volcanoes or volcanic action.

A region of vulcanian activity.

R. A. Proctor, Poetry of Astronomy, p. 228.

2. In geol., pertaining to or designating the system or theory of the Vulcanists, or opponents of Werner.

Vulcanic (vul-kan'ik), a. [= F. vulcanique = Sp. volcánico = Pg. volcánico = It. volcanico; as Vulcan + -ic. Cf. volcano.] Pertaining or relating to Vulcan or to volcanoes.

Even the burning of a meeting-house, in itself a vulcanic rarity (so long as he was of another parish), could not tickle his outworn palate. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 120.

vulcanicity (vul-ka-nis'i-ti), n. [< vulcanic + -ity.] Same as volcanicity.

This [heat-producing] power, inadequate though it may be to explain the phenomena of vulcanicity.

J. Prestwich, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 425.

The term volcanic action (vulcanism or vulcanicity) embraces all the phenomena connected with the expulsion of heated materials from the interior of the earth to the surface. Encyc. Brit., X. 240.

vulcanisable, vulcanisation, etc. See vulcanizable, etc. vulcanism (vul'kan-izm), n. [< Vulcan + -ism.] In geol., same as volcanism. The words volcano and volcanic are firmly fixed in English, and the former is in universal and exclusive use among those who speak that language. Hence all the derivatives should be spelled correspondingly: thus, volcanism, volcanicity, volcanology, and not vulcanism, etc.

In the lapse of ages . . . the very roots of former volcanoes have been laid bare, displaying subterranean phases of vulcanism which could not be studied in any modern volcano. Encyc. Brit., X. 240.

Vulcanist (vul'kan-ist), n. [< Vulcan + -ist.] In the early history of geological science, one who supported the Huttonian theory, or who was in opposition to the views of Werner. See Huttonian.

It is sufficient to remark that these systems are usually reduced to two classes, according as they refer the origin of terrestrial bodies to fire or water; and that, conformably to this division, their followers have of late been distinguished by the fanciful names of Vulcanists and Nepturnists. To the former of these Dr. Hutton belongs much more than to the latter; though, as he employs the agency both of fire and water in his system, he cannot, in strict propriety, be arranged with either.

Playfair, Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory [(Coll. Works, I. 21).

1. The harder of the two forms of vulcanized india-rubber, the other form being known as soft rubber. Vulcanite differs from soft rubber in that it contains more sulphur, and is cured or vulcanized at a higher temperature. It is of a brownish-black color, is hard and tough, cuts easily, and takes a good polish; it is largely used for making into combs, brooches, bracelets, and many other ornaments. It is not affected by water or by any of the other caoutchouc solvents. As it is especially distinguished by the large quantity of electricity which it evolves when rubbed, it is much used in the construction of electric machines. Also called ebonite.

2. A name sometimes given to pyroxene, from its being found in ejected blocks and lavas.—Vulcanite flask, an iron box closed by screw-bolts, for holding an artificial denture while being vulcanized, to fix the artificial teeth in the vulcanite plate. The flask is heated in a vulcanizing furnace.

vulcanizable (vul'kan-i-zā-bl), a. [< vulcanize + -able.] Capable of being vulcanized; admitting of vulcanization. Also spelled vulcanisable.

vulcanization (vul'kan-i-zā'shon), n. [< vulcanize + -ation.] A method of treating caoutchouc or india-rubber with some form of sulphur, to effect certain changes in its properties, and yield a soft (vulcanized india-rubber) or a hard (vulcanite) product. This was originally effected by dipping the rubber in melted sulphur and heating it to nearly 300°. Several other methods have been employed, probably the best of which for general purposes consists in mechanically mixing the rubber at a moderate heat with flowers of sulphur, and subsequently "curing" it in superheated steam at from 250° to 300° Fahr. The process was invented by Charles Goodyear, who obtained his first patent for it in 1844. Other ingredients, as litharge, white lead, zinc-white, whiting, etc., are added to the sulphur to give color, softness, etc., to the rubber. The substance thus formed possesses the following properties: it remains elastic at all temperatures; it cannot be dissolved by the ordinary solvents, neither is it affected by heat within a considerable range of temperature; finally, it acquires extraordinary powers of resisting compression, with a great increase of strength and elasticity. Vulcanized india-rubber is employed with great success for very many useful purposes, as for waterproofing cloth, for boots, shoes, mats, toys, belting, buffers, wheel-tires, washers, valves, pipes, fire-hose, medical and surgical appliances, etc. Hard vulcanized rubber is known as ebonite or vulcanite. See vulcanite. Also spelled vulcanisation.

vulcanize (vul'kan-iz), v.; pret. and pp. vulcanized, ppr. vulcanizing. [= F. vulcaniser; as Vulcan (with allusion to the melted sulphur of volcanoes) + -ize.] I. trans. To subject to the process of vulcanization, as caoutchouc.—Vulcanized fiber. See fiber<sup>1</sup>.—Vulcanized glass, glass cooled by plunging into a bath having a comparatively high temperature. The nature of the bath depends upon the effect desired to be produced.—Vulcanized rubber, caoutchouc incorporated with sulphur and subjected to heat, whereby it combines chemically with the sulphur, and assumes, when cold, a hard consistency resembling that of horn.

II. intrans. To admit of vulcanization.

Rubber vulcanises at 276° Fahr.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LXII. 140.

Also spelled vulcanise.

vulcanizer (vul'kan-i-zér), n. [< vulcanize + -er<sup>1</sup>.] Apparatus used in vulcanizing india-rubber. Also spelled vulcaniser.

vulcanot, n. An old form of volcano.

vulcanological (vul'ka-nô-loj'i-kal), a. Same as volcanological. Nature, XXXVIII. 410.

vulcanology (vul-ka-nôl'ô-jî), n. Same as volcanology.

vulg. An abbreviation of vulgar or vulgarily.

Vulg. An abbreviation of Vulgate.

vulgar (vul'gär), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also vulgare; < F. vulgaire = Sp. Pg. vulgar = It. vulgare, < L. vulgaris, vulgaris, of or pertaining to the multitude or common people, common, vulgar, < vulgus, vulgus, a multitude, throng, crowd, the mass of people, the common people, the multitude; cf. Skt. vraja, a flock, herd, multitude, varga, a group, troop, < vaj, turn, twist, set aside, = L. vergere, bend, turn: see verge<sup>2</sup>. From L. vulgus are also E. vulgate, etc., divulge, etc.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the common people; suited to or practised among the multitude; plebeian: as, vulgar life; vulgar sports.

A few of them went a lande for fresshe water, and fownd a greate and high howse after the maner of their buylding, hauinge xlii. other of their vulgar cotages placed aboute the same.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 70].

An habitation giddy and unsure

Hath he that buildeth on the vulgar hearth.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 3. 90.

"Follow my white plume," said the chivalrous monarch of France, as he plunged into the thickest of the vulgar fight.

Sumner, Orations, I. 188.

2. Common; in general use; customary; usual; ordinary.

Our intent is to make this Art [Poesie] vulgar for all English mens vse. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 19.

As naked as the vulgar air. Shak., E. John, ii. 1. 387.

They have applied the sense of the parables to certain general and vulgar matters, without reaching to their real purport.

Bacon, Physical Fables, p. 8.

I shall much rejoice to see and serve you, whom I honour with no vulgar Affection. Howell, Letters, I. ii. 24.

Unspeakable mysteries in the Scriptures are often delivered in a vulgar and illustrative way.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 45.

If Wordsworth sometimes puts the trumpet to his lips, yet he lays it aside soon and willingly for his appropriate instrument, the pastoral reed. And it is not one that grew by any vulgar stream, but that which Apollo breathed through, tending the flocks of Admetus.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 241.

3. Hence, national; vernacular: as, the vulgar tongue; the vulgar version of the Scriptures; in zool. and bot., specifically, vernacular or trivial, as opposed to scientific or technical, in the names or naming of plants and animals. See pseudonym, 2.

If againe Art be but a certaine order of rules prescribed by reason, and gathered by experience, why should not Poesie be a vulgar Art with vs as well as with the Greeks and Latines? Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 3.

We will in this present chapter & by our own idle observations shew how one may easily and commodiously lead all those feet of the ancients into our vulgar language.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 86.

Of the Egyptian letters, or manner of writing, one was vulgar, which all people learnt; others were call'd sacred, which the priests only knew among the Egyptians.

Pococke, Description of the East, I. 227.

4. Pertaining or belonging to the lower or less refined class of people; unrefined; hence, coarse; offensive to good taste; rude; boorish; low; mean; base: as, vulgar men, language, minds, or manners.

Stale and cheap to vulgar company.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 2. 41.

I staid to hear the trumpets and kettle-drums, and then the other drums, which are much cried up, though I think it dull, vulgar musick.

Pepys, Diary, I. 150.

Gold:

Before whose image bow the vulgar great.

Shelley, Queen Mab, iv.

vulgarization (vul'gär-iz), n. [< vul- + -ation.] 1. Wide dissemination; the process of rendering commonly known or familiar.

His paper is the general exhibition of the results of that vulgarization which is the aim of the French anthropologists.

Within the last few years competent authorities of different countries have been engaged with the inconveniences and injury that may result to public health and morality by the vulgarization of hygienic phenomena.

Lancet, 1889, I, 861.

2. A backing course, or gross; the impairing of refinement or elegance.

Peter has this early well escaped vulgarization and misrepresentation at the hands of the globe-trotter, with his worthless "impressions."

Westminster Rev., CXXVIII, 454.

Also spelled vulgarisation.

vulgarize (vul'gär-iz), v. [< pret. and pp. vulgar- + -ize.] [< F. vulgariser = Sp. Pg. vulgarizar = It. vulgarizzare; as vulgar + -ize.]

1. trans. To make vulgar or common.

The case of Augustus Caesar, no nomen sum obsolete, that the majesty of his name should not be vulgarized by bad poets, is more seriously needed in our days on behalf of great poets, to protect them from trivial or too parrot-like citation.

De Quincey, Style, iii.

His marriage to that woman has hopelessly vulgarized him.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxv.

The image is, therefore, out of all imaginative keeping, and vulgarizes the chief personage in a grand historical tragedy, who, if not a great, was at least a decorous actor.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 262.

II. intrans. 1. To produce vulgarity.

Nothing refines like affection. Family jarring vulgarizes; family union elevates. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, vi.

2. To act in a vulgar manner.

Nor ever may descend to vulgarise.
Or be below the sphere of her abode.

Daniel, To Lady Anne Clifford.

Also spelled vulgarise.

vulgarly (vul'gär-li), adv. 1. In a vulgar manner; commonly; popularly; in the manner usual among the common people.

The cleere gaines of those metals, the Kings part defraided, to the Adventurers is but small, and nothing neere so much as vulgarly is imagined.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II, 74.

It is vulgarly believed that this boat represents a magnificent vessel. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II, 262.

2. By or before the people; publicly.

To justify this worthy nobleman,
So vulgarly and personally accused.

Shak., M. for M., v. 1, 160.

3. Coarsely; rudely; clownishly.

vulgarness (vul'gär-nes), n. The state or character of being vulgar; vulgarity.

vulgate (vul'gät), a. and n. [I. a. = Sp. vulgado = Old. vulgato, < L. vulgatus, common, general, ordinary, pp. of vulgare, make common, spread abroad, < vulgus, the common people; see vulgar.] II. n. = F. vulgate = It. vulgata, < ML. vulgata, sc. editio, the common edition, fem. of L. vulgatus, common; see I.] I. a. 1. Common; general; popular.

In this, the vulgate text [of "Perse" of Æschylus], the word καὶ φησὶ might not itself arouse suspicion.

Amer. Jour. Philol., IX, 321.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Vulgate, or old Latin version of the Scriptures.

II. n. [cap.] 1. The Latin version of the Scriptures accepted as the authorized version of the Roman Catholic Church. It was prepared by Jerome about the close of the fourth century, partly by translation from the original, partly by revision of prior Latin versions. The Vulgate gradually came into general use between the sixth and the ninth century. The Anglo-Saxon translations were made from it and Wyclif's onward have been much influenced by it. The Vulgate was the first book printed (about 1455). The Council of Trent ordered that the "old and vulgate edition," approved by the "usage of so many ages," should be the only Latin version used in "public lectures, disputations, sermons, and expositions." Authorized editions were afterward published under Sixtus V. in 1590 and Clement VIII. in 1592-3. The latter, or Clementine edition, is the present accepted standard of the Roman Catholic Church, and is the basis of the Douay Bible. The religious terminology of the languages of western Europe has been in great part derived from or influenced by the Vulgate.

2. The vulgar or popular tongue; the vernacular. [Rare.]

"Here's a pretty mess," returned the pompous gentleman, descending to the vulgate; "you threaten me, forsooth!"

J. E. Cooke, Virginia Comedians, I, xiii.

vulgus (vul'gus), n. [L. vulgus, the common people; see vulgar.] See the quotation.

Now be it known unto all you boys who are at schools which do not rejoice in the time-honoured institution of the Vulgus (commonly supposed to have been established by William of Wykeham at Winchester, and imported to Rugby by Arnold, more for the sake of the lines which were learnt by heart with it than for its own intrinsic value, as I've always understood), that it is a short exercise, in Greek or Latin verse, on a given subject, the minimum number of lines being fixed for each form.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, II, 3.

vuln (vuln), v. t. [< OF. *vulnerer, < L. vulnerare, wound; see vulnerable.] To wound; in heraldry, especially said of the pelican, which is blazoned as vulning herself when represented as tearing her breast to feed her young. Compare pelican in her piety, under pelican.

When in the profile she [the pelican in heraldry] is usually vulning herself.

Encyc. Brit., XI, 701.

vulned (vulnd), a. [< vuln + -ed.] In heraldry, wounded; noting any animal used as a bearing, the weapon which inflicts the wound being generally mentioned. Frequently, however, vulned refers to the bleeding of the wound; thus, the blazon may be pierced by an arrow and vulned.

A Pelican with wings expanded argent, Vulned Proper. Guillim, Heraldry (1724), p. 224.

vulnera, n. Plural of vulnus.

vulnerability (vul'ne-rä-bil'i-ti), n. [< vulner- + -ity (see -ility).] The state or property of being vulnerable; vulnerability.

vulnerable (vul'ne-rä-bl), a. [< F. vulnérable = Sp. vulnerable = Pg. vulneravel = It. vulnerabile, < LL. vulnerabilis, wounding, injurious, < L. vulnerare, wound, hurt; see vulnere.] 1. Capable of wounding; dangerous. [Rare.]

The male children practise to ride great horses, to throw the vulnerable and inevitable dart.

Ambassy of Sir R. Shirley (1609). (Davies.)

2. Capable of being wounded; susceptible of wounds or injuries, literally or figuratively.

Let fall thy blade on vulnerable crests.

Shak., Macbeth, v. 8, 11.

It is the middle compound character which alone is vulnerable: the man who, without firmness enough to avoid a dishonorable action, has feeling enough to be ashamed of it.

Junius, to Sir W. Draper, March 3, 1769.

The hat is the vulnerable part of the artificial integument.

O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, viii.

vulnerableness (vul'ne-rä-bl-nes), n. Vulnerability.

vulnerary (vul'ne-rä-ri), a. and n. [= F. vulnéraire = Sp. Pg. It. vulnerario, < L. vulnerarius, of or pertaining to wounds, < vulnus (vulner), a wound; see vulnere.] I. a. 1. Causing wounds. [Rare.]

The aspect of his eye alone does sometimes become not only vulnerary, but mortal.

Feltham, Resolves, II, 56.

2. Useful in healing wounds; adapted to the cure of external injuries: as, vulnerary plants or potions.

Her aunt sought in their baggage for some vulnerary remedy.

Scott, Quentin Durward, xv.

The plant [henna] is further credited with the possession of vulnerary and astringent properties.

Encyc. Brit., XI, 654.

II. n.; pl. vulneraries (-riz). A remedy applied to wounds to favor their healing.

Like a balsamic vulnerary.

V. Knox, Christian Philosophy, § 38.

vulnerate (vul'ne-rät), v. t. [< L. vulneratus, pp. of vulnerare (> It. vulnerare = Sp. vulnerar = OF. *vulnerer), wound, injure, < vulnus (vulner), a wound; cf. Skt. vrana, a wound, fracture; prob. from the root of vellere, perf. vulsi, pluck, tear; see vulture.] To wound; hurt; injure.

Rather murder me than vulnerate still your creature, unless you mean to medicine where you have hurt.

Shirley, Love Tricks, III, 5.

vulneration (vul'ne-rä'shon), n. [= F. vulneration = Sp. vulneración = Pg. vulneração, < L. vulneratio(n-), a wounding, an injury, < vulnerare, wound; see vulnere.] The act of wounding, or the state of being wounded.

He speaks of the Son of God, which was to be the Son of Man, and by our nature liable to vulneration.

Ep. Pearson, On the Creed, iv.

vulnerose (vul'ne-rös), a. [= It. vulneroso, < L. vulnus (vulner), a wound, + -ose.] Full of wounds; having wounds; wounded.

vulnific (vul-nif'ik), a. [< L. vulnificus, wound-making, < vulnus, a wound, + facere, make (see -fic).] Causing wounds; inflicting wounds.

Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

vulnific (vul-nif'ik-äl), a. [< vulnific + -al.] Same as vulnific.

vulnus (vul'vus), n.; pl. vulnera (-ne-rä). [I. a.] A wound.—Vitis vulnus, the wound-gall of the grape. See vine-gall.—Vulnus scopeticum, a gunshot wound: technical in military and naval surgery.

Vulpecula cum Anser (vul-pek'ü-lä kum an'se-rö). [L. vulpecula, dim. of vulpes, a fox;

cum, with; anser, abl. of anser, goose.] A constellation, the Fox with the Goose, first appearing in the "Prodromus Astronomie" of Hevelius, 1690. It lies between the Eagle and the Swan, and is generally called Vulpecula. It has one star of the fourth magnitude.

vulpecular (vul-pek'ŭ-lăr), a. [L. vulpecula, a little fox, dim. of vulpes, a fox: see Vulpes.] Of the nature of a fox; vulpine; of or pertaining to a fox's whelp.

Vulpes (vul'pēs), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1756), < L. vulpes, vulpes, also vulpis, a fox; cf. Gr. ὑλπίς, a fox.] A genus of foxes, giving name to the Vulpinæ, whose type species is the common red fox, Canis vulpes of earlier naturalists, now Vulpes vulgaris or V. fulvus. All the vulpine quadrupeds have been placed in this genus, which, however, is now restricted by the exclusion of such forms as Urocyon (the gray foxes of America), Otocyon or Megalotis of Africa, and Nyctereutes of Japan. Even with these restrictions there are numerous species, of Europe, Asia, Africa, and North America (none in South America), closely related to the common fox; as well as the more different types represented by the African fennec (Vulpes (Fennecus) zerdai), the Asiatic corsac (V. corsac), the North American kit (V. velox), and the circum-polar isatis, or arctic fox (V. lagopus). See cuts under arctic, cross-fox, fennec fox, and kit fox.

vulpicide<sup>2</sup> (vul'pi-sid), n. [L. vulpes, a fox, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] The killing of a fox or of foxes.

Vulpicide, committed in defence of property, and condemned neither by religion, nor by equity, nor by any law save that of sportsmen, excites an anger that cries aloud for positive penalties.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 245.

Vulpinæ (vul-pī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vulpes + -inæ.] A subfamily of Canidae, represented by the genus Vulpes in a broad sense, containing the foxes as distinguished from the dogs, wolves, and jackals; the alopecoid canines. The frontal region of the skull is comparatively low from lack of frontal sinuses, and the pupil of the eye usually contracts to a vertical elliptical figure. But the group is not sharply delimited from Caninæ, as the South American fox-wolves (see Pseudalopex) and some African forms (see Thous) connect the two. See Urocyon (with cut), Vulpes (with cuts there cited), and compare Megalotina.

vulpinate, v. i. "To play the fox"; deceive with crafty wiles or deceptions. Blount, 1670.

vulpine (vul'pin), a. [= F. vulpin = Sp. vulpino = It. volpino, volpigno, < L. vulpinus, of or pertaining to a fox, < vulpes, a fox: see Vulpes.] 1. Of or pertaining to a fox; technically, resembling the fox as a member of the Vulpinæ; related to the foxes; alopecoid: distinguished from lupine or thooid.

Sometimes I heard the foxes as they ranged over the snow crust, in moonlight nights. . . Sometimes one came near to my window, attracted by my light, barked a vulpine curse at me, and then retreated.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 293.

2. Resembling a fox in traits or disposition; also, characteristic of the fox; foxy; cunning; crafty.

The slyness of a vulpine craft. Feltham, Resolves, i. 12.

Smooth vulpine determination. Kingsley, Hypatia, xiv.

Vulpine opossum, phalanger, or phalangist, Phalangista (now Trichosurus) vulpinus, also called brush-tailed Vulpine Phalanger Trichosurus vulpinus.

opossum, somewhat resembling a fox, native of Australia, about 2 feet long, with long, hairy, and prehensile tail, and of arboreal habits like other phalangers.—Vulpine series, the alopecoid series of canines.

vulpinism (vul'pi-nizm), n. [< vulpine + -ism.] The property of being vulpine; craft; artfulness; cunning. Carlyle.

vulpinite (vul'pi-nit), n. [< Vulpino (see def.) + -ite.] A scaly granular variety of the mineral anhydrite. It occurs at Vulpino in Italy, and is sometimes employed for small statues and other ornamental work under the name of marino bardiglio.

vulsella (vul-sel'ŭ), n. [Also vultella; < L. vultella, vultella, vulsella, pincers, < vellere, pp. vulsus, pluck: cf. vulture.] 1. Pl. vulsellæ (-ē). A forceps; specifically, a forceps, usually with toothed or claw-like blades, used for grasping and holding any of the tissues, and also for removing foreign bodies lodged in the throat or other passages. Also vulsella forep.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Lamarck, 1799).] A genus of monomyarian bivalves, containing such as V. lingulata of East Indian seas.

vulsellum (vul-sel'um), n.; pl. vulsella (-i). [NL.] Same as vulsella, 1.

The greater part of the growth was severed by working the écraseur, and removed through the mouth with a vulsellum.

Lancet, 1889, i. 1032.

vulturn, n. An old spelling of vultur.

Vultur (vul'tēr), n. [NL.: see vulture.] A Linnean genus of Falconidae, variously defined. (a) Including all the vultures of both hemispheres. (b) Restricted to certain Old World vultures, as V. monachus.

vulture (vul'tūr), n. [< ME. vultur, vultur, voutur, voutre, < OF. voutour, voutour, voutre, F. voutour = Pr. vultur, voutur = Sp. buitre = Pg. abutre = It. vultore, It. avoltore, avoltojo = W. flietter, < L. vultur, vultur, OL. also vulturis, vulturis, also vulturis, vulturis, a vulture, a bird of prey, lit. 'plucker.' < vellere (perf. vulsi), pluck: see vellicate, and cf. vulnerable.] 1. One of sundry large birds, of the order Raptores, which have the head and neck more or less bare of feathers, the beak and claws less powerful than in most birds of prey, and which feed largely or wholly upon carrion. They for the most part inhabit warm countries. Birds of this description are found both in the Old World and in the New; and, misled by superficial appearances and general habits, naturalists have applied the name to members of different suborders. (a) The Old World vultures, which, in spite of their peculiar outward aspect, are so little different from ordinary hawks and eagles that they can at most be considered as a subfamily Vulturinæ of the family Falconidae. Of these there are several genera and numerous species, inhabiting the warmer parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, where they act as efficient scavengers to clear the earth of offal and carcasses, which would otherwise become offensive. The cinereous or brown vulture, Vultur monachus or V. cinereus, is a typical example; it inhabits all countries bordering the Mediterranean, and extends thence to India and China. The griffin-vultures are species of Gyps. The Bengal vulture, inhabiting India, is Pseudogyps bengalensis. Related species are the Angola vulture, Gypohierax angolensis (see cut under Gypohierax), the immense Otogyps auricularis, of Africa (see Otogyps), and Lophogyps occipitalis. The Egyptian vulture, quite unlike any of the foregoing, is Neophron percnopterus, often called Pharaoh's hen (see cut under Neophron). The bearded vulture of the Alps, etc., or the lammergeier, Gypaetus barbatus, has the head feathered, and does not hesitate to attack living animals; this is the connecting-link between vultures and hawks or eagles, being sometimes placed in Vulturinæ, sometimes in Falconinæ. (See cut under Gypaetus.) (b) The American vultures of the suborder Cathartides. The species of this group with which the name vulture is specifically connected are the urubu, or black vulture, Cathartes atrata; the turkey-buzzard or turkey-vulture, Cathartes aura; and the king-vulture, Sarcophagophaga papa: the condor usually keeps its own distinctive name. See Cathartide, and cuts under condor, king-vulture, turkey-buzzard, and urubu.

Brown Vulture (Vultur monachus).

Whos stomak fowles tyren everemo,
That hyghen vulturis, as bookes telle.

Chaucer, Troilus, i. 788.

2. Figuratively, one who or that which resembles a vulture, especially in rapacity or in the thirst for prey.

Ye dregs of baseness, vultures amongst men,
That tire upon the hearts of generous spirits!

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, ii. 1.

Here am I, bound upon this pillared rock,
Prey to the culture of a vast desire

That feeds upon my life. O. W. Holmes, Regrets.

Let Austria's culture have food for her hawk.

Whittier, From Perugia.

Abyssinian vulture, the Lophogyps occipitalis, in which the head is not bare, the bill is red, with black tip and blue base, the feet are flesh-color, the eyes brown, and the length is nearly 3 feet. It inhabits much of Africa, and was first described by Latham in 1821.—Arabian vulture, the brown or cinereous vulture, Vultur monachus. Latham, 1781.—Ash-colored vulture, the Egyptian vulture. Latham, 1781.—Bearded vulture. See def. 1 (a).—Bengal vulture. See def. 1 (a).—Black vulture. (a) See def. 1 (b). (b) The Vultur monachus. Latham, 1781.—Brown vulture. See def. 1 (a).—Californian vulture, the Californian condor. See cut under condor.—Changou vulture, the Bengal vulture: so called by Latham, 1801, after le Changou of Levaillant, 1799.—Cinereous vulture. See def. 1 (a).—Crested or capped black vulture, the brown or cinereous vulture, Vultur monachus. Edwards, 1760.—Eagle-vulture, the West African Gypohierax angolensis. Also called vulturine sea-eagle. See cut under Gypohierax.—Eared vulture, a vulture of the genus Otogyps, specifically O. auricularis.—Egyptian vulture. See def. 1 (a).—Fulvous vulture, one of the griffin-vultures, Gyps fulvus. Latham, 1781.—Gingiv vulture, Neophron gingivianus, the Indian representative of the Egyptian vulture. Latham, 1787 and 1821.—Indian vulture, one of the griffin-vultures, Gyps indicus, of the Indian and Malayan peninsulas, Burma, and Siam.—King of the vultures, the king-vulture. See def. 1 (b).—Maltese vulture, the Egyptian vulture. Latham, 1781.—Nubian vulture, one of the eared vultures, Otogyps auricularis.—Pileated vulture, Neophron pileatus, the South African representative of the Egyptian vulture, first described as Vultur pileatus by Burchell in 1824.—Pondicherry vulture, one of the eared vultures, Otogyps catrus.—Rachamah vulture, the Egyptian vulture. Bruce, 1790.—Ruppell's vulture, one of the griffin-vultures, Gyps ruppelli.—Sacred vulture, a bird described by William Bartram in 1791, under the name of Vultur sacra, as inhabiting Florida. It has not been identified, but is supposed to be the king-vulture, Sarcophagophaga papa.—The vulture, the fulvous vulture, Gyps fulvus.—Turkey-vulture. See turkey-buzzard, and cut under Cathartes.—White vulture, the Egyptian vulture.

vulture-raven (vul'tūr-rā'vn), n. A book-name of the thick-billed African ravens, of the genus Corvultur, C. albicollis and C. crassirostris. They are noted for the stoutness and especially the depth of the bill, resulting from the strong convexity of the high-arched culmen, like that of a bird of prey. C. albicollis is 18 inches long, with the bill 3 inches along the culmen; the plumage is glossy-black, with concealed white on the neck; the beak is dark-brown, with the tips of the mandibles whitish; the feet are brownish-black, the irides hazel-brown. This species is South African. C. crassirostris, of northeastern Africa, is larger, being 2 feet long, with the beak nearly 4 inches. The former species was originally described by Latham as the South Sea raven, and later by Levaillant as the corvina (whence the generic name Corvultur imposed by Lesson in 1831); another synonym is Corvus vulturinus.

Vulturidæ (vul-tū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < L. vultur, a vulture (see vulture), + -idæ.] A family of birds, artificially composed of the birds popularly called vultures in both hemispheres. There are no good characters to distinguish the Old World vultures from the family Falconidae, of which they may at most form a subfamily Vulturinæ, while, on the other hand, there are strong characters separating the American vultures from all others. The family has in consequence been nearly abandoned by ornithologists, or at least restricted to the Old World vultures. See vulture.

Vulturinæ (vul-tū'ri-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vultur + -inæ.] A subfamily of Falconidae, confined to the Old World, and consisting of the vultures of Europe, Asia, and Africa, characterized chiefly by their naked heads and carrion-feeding habits. See vulture.

vulturine (vul'tūr-in), a. [< L. vulturinus, of or pertaining to a vulture, < vultur, a vulture, see vulture.] 1. Resembling a vulture; of or pertaining to the Vulturinæ.—2. Characteristic of a vulture, as in scavenging carrion. Also vulturish.

The vulturine nose, which smells nothing but corruption, is no credit to its possessor.

Kingsley, Two Years Ago, x.

Vulturine eagle, Aquila verreauxi, of Lesson, described also the same year (1830) as Aquila vulturina by Sir A. Smith. This is an African eagle, 3 feet long, with the feet feathered to the toes, and otherwise congeneric with the golden eagle. When adult it is black, more or less extensively white on the back, rump, and upper tail-coverts;

Head of Vulture raven (Corvultur albicollis).

vulvitis (vul-vi'tis), n. [NL., < L. vulva + -itis.] Inflammation of the vulva.

vulvo-uterine (vul-vō-ū'tē-rin), a. Of or pertaining to the vulva and the uterus: as, the vulvo-uterine canal (the vagina).

vulvovaginal (vul-vō-vaj'i-nal), a. Pertaining to the vulva and the vagina.—Vulvovaginal canal. Summeiservagina. Vulvovaginal glands, the glands of Bartholin or odoriferous glands in the female, corresponding to Cowper's glands in the male. See gland.

vulvovaginitis (vul-vō-vaj-i-nī'tis), n. [NL., vulva + vagina + -itis.] Inflammation of both the vulva and the vagina.

vum (vum), v. i. A corruption or equivalent of cow, used in the expression "I vum," a mild expletive or oath. Compare sican<sup>2</sup>. [New Eng.]

vulva (vul'və), v. [= F. vulve = Sp. Pg. vulva (It. vulva, vulva, vulva, a covering, integument), with b,  $\zeta$  volvere, roll around or about; see vummera, n. Same as wummerah.

V-vat (ve' vat), n. In mining, a pointed or V-shaped box in which crushed or pulverized ores are sized or classified by the aid of water. The earthy particles mingled with the ore entering above fall against a current of water rising from beneath, the velocity of which is regulated so that a more or less complete separation of the ore from the gangue is effected. These boxes are generally arranged in a series of four or more, and there are many varieties of the apparatus, of which the general principle was the invention of Von Rittinger, an Austrian metallurgist. This method has proved to be of great value in ore-dressing. Also called pointed box, pyramidal box, and spitzkasten.

vyingly (vi'ing-li), adv. Emulously. Encyc. Dict.

vynet, n. An obsolete spelling of vine.
vynert, n. An obsolete spelling of viner<sup>1</sup>, vi-

vysart, n. An obsolete spelling of vizor.

1. The twenty-third letter and eighteenth consonant-sign in the English alphabet. It has a double value, as consonant and as vowel. As an alphabetic character it is of very modern date, being one of the four that have sprung from the V or F added by the Greeks to the older Phœnician alphabet, and one of the three (V, F, W) that have grown out of the Roman form of that character (see V). It was made (as pointed out under V) by doubling the V or F-sign (hence called double V), in order to distinguish properly the semivowel sound w from the spirant v and the vowel u. It was formerly often printed as two V's, VV, vv. It began to be used in the eleventh century, and gradually crowded out the special sign for the same sound which the Anglo-Saxon alphabet had possessed. The alphabetic sound distinctively represented by w is the labial semivowel, which stands in precisely the same relation to oo (o) in which consonantal y stands to ee (e). Each of these semivowels, if not of precisely the same mode of production with the corresponding vowel, is at any rate only very slightly different from it; w is virtually an oo which is abbreviated into a mere prefix to another vowel, a close position from which the organs by opening reach another vowel-sound; and a prolonged w is an oo. On the other hand, the semivowel y (like the semivowel y) can be only very imperfectly and indistinctly uttered after a vowel, and our w in that position is but another way of writing y; it is found only in the combinations aw, er, ow, which are equivalent to ay, ey, oy; and as so used it could disappear from the language without any loss, but rather with profit. The semivowel sound w (including wh and qu, which is a way of writing kw, see under Q) is a not uncommon element of English utterance, being about 21 per cent. of it (a little less than the spirant r). In many languages—for example, in all those that are descended from the Latin—the semivowel w tends to pass over into the spirant v-sound, and hence the spirant value of our w, which was the representative in Latin of the w-sound. In Anglo-Saxon a w stood and was pronounced also before r (and in a few words before l); in such words as write, wring, the character is retained, though the sound is lost. In Anglo-Saxon, also, the w was in many words pronounced with a preceding aspiration, the relic of an original prefixed guttural mute, and it was consistently and properly so written: for example, hwæt, white, hwær, where. In modern English the h has by an odd and unaccountable caprice had its place in writing changed to after the w (perhaps by analogy with the similar blunder shown in writing rh in Latin for the Greek aspirated r, or hr, or by a blind conformity with the frequent initial digraphs th, ph, eh). There is dispute among phonetists at present as to the true character of this wh-sound, some maintaining that it is not a w with preceding aspiration, but a surd counterpart to w, standing related to it as, for example, an f to a, or an s to a. This view rests in part, probably, on some actual difference of utterance, but in part also on unfamiliarity with the real wh; for in England the aspiration is now very generally omitted, and when, while, etc., are pronounced as wen, rite, etc. It admits of no question, however, that when, for example, is related to hoo-en precisely as wen to oo-en, the difference in each case consisting in an aspiration prefixed respectively to the vowel and semivowel—just as, correspondingly, hew (which shows an h prefixed to the English “long u” sound, or yoo) is related to hoo-oo precisely as ew to oo: the h being here, as everywhere else (see H), uttered through the same position of the mouth-organs as the following sound. W is sometimes silent, not only as initial before r (see above), but elsewhere, as in two, sword, answer, etc. It is never doubled. The assimilating influence of a w (whether written with w or with u in the combination qu) in a following a-sound is very marked, giving the a in many words the short sound of o (o), as in what, spend, etc., or the broad sound of a (a), as in war, quart, thwart, etc.

2. As a symbol: (a) In chem., the symbol for tungsten (NL. wolframium). (b) [l. c.] In hydrodynamics, the symbol for the component of the velocity parallel to the axis of Z.—3. As an abbreviation: (a) of west; (b) of western; (c) of William; (d) of Wednesday; (e) of Welsh; (f) of warden; (g) [l. c.] of week.

wad (wä or wä), n. A Scotch form of wall.
waat, n. An obsolete form of voc.
waag (wäg), n. [Native Abyssinian name.] The grivet, a monkey.

wabber (wob'ér), n. Same as cony, 2.

of wapper, freq. of wap<sup>1</sup>: see wap<sup>1</sup>.] I. intrans. 1. To incline to the one side and to the other alternately, as a wheel, top, spindle, or other rotating body when not properly balanced; move in the manner of a rotating disk when its plane vibrates from side to side; rock; vacillate.

To wabble . . . [a low barbarous word]. Johnson, Dict. When . . . the top falls on to the table, . . . it falls into a certain oscillation, described by the expressive though inelegant word wabbling.

H. Spencer, First Principles, § 170. It [a pendulum] should be symmetrical on each side of the middle plane of its vibration, or it will wobble.

Sir E. Beckett, Clocks and Watches, p. 42. Hence—2. To vacillate, vibrate, tremble, or exhibit unevenness, in senses other than mechanical. [Colloq.]

Ferri . . . made use of the tremolo upon every note, to such an extent that his whole singing was a bad wabbling trill.

II. trans. To cause to wabble: as, to wabble one's head. [Colloq.]

wabble<sup>1</sup>, wobble (wob'li), n. [< wabble<sup>1</sup>, v.] A rocking, unequal motion, as of a wheel unevenly hung or a top imperfectly balanced.

The wind had raised a middling stiff wobble on the water, and the boat jumped and tumbled in a very lively manner.

W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xx. wabble<sup>2</sup> (wob'li), n. [A dial. var. of warble<sup>3</sup>, 3.] The larva of the emasculating bot-fly, Cutiterebra emasculator, which infests squirrels in the United States; also, the injury or affection resulting from its presence. See warble<sup>3</sup>, and cut under Cutiterebra. Also worble.

A very large percentage [of fifty chipmunks] . . . were infested with wabbles.

Rep. of U. S. Dept. of Agriculture (1889), I. 215. wabble<sup>3+</sup> (wob'li), n. An old name of the great auk, Alca impennis. Josselyn, New England Rarities Discovered.

wabber (wob'ér), n. [< wabble<sup>1</sup> + -er<sup>1</sup>] One who or that which wabbles. Specifically—(a) Same as drunken cutter (which see, under cutter). (b) A boiled leg of mutton. [Prov. Eng.]

wabble-saw (wob'li-sä), n. A circular saw hung out of true on its arbor, used to cut dovetail slots, mortises, etc. E. H. Knight.

Dismal sounds may express dismal emotions, and soft sounds soft emotions, and wabbly sounds uncertain emotions.

wabster (wäb'stér), n. A Scotch form of webster.

Willie was a wabster gude, Could stown a clew wi' ony body.

Burns, Willie Wastie.

wacapou (wak'a-pö), n. A leguminous tree, Andira Aubletii, of French Guiana. It furnishes a brownish straight-grained wood, scarcely sound enough for architectural purposes, but suitable for many domestic uses. A similar but inferior wood is called wacapou gris.

wacchet, waccheret. Old spellings of watch, watcher.

wacke (wak'e), n. [< G. wacke, MHG. wacke, a rock projecting from the surface of the ground, a large flint or stone; origin unknown.] A soft homogeneous clay arising from the decomposition of some form of volcanic or eruptive rock. It is of a greenish or brownish color. Compare graywacke.

wacken<sup>1</sup> (wak'n), v. An obsolete or dialectal form of waken.

wad<sup>1</sup> (wod), n. [Early mod. E. wadde; cf. D. watte = G. watte, wad, wadding, = OSw. wad, clothing, cloth, stuff, Sw. vadd, wadding, = Dan. vat, wadding, = Icel. **vadr*, in comp. vadmál, a woolen stuff, wadmal (see wadmal); akin to MD. waede, waeye = MLG. wade, G. watte, a large fishing-net, = Icel. vadr, a fishing-net, and to AS. wæd, etc., clothing, weed: see weed<sup>2</sup>. Hence (< G. watte) F. ouate (> Sp. huata) = It. ovata (ML. wadda) = Russ. vata, wad, wadding. The relations of the forms are involved; E. wad is perhaps in part short for the obs. wadmal.] 1. A small bunch or wisp of rags, hay, hair, wool, or other fibrous material, used for stuffing, for lessening the shock of hard bodies against each other, or for packing.

A wisp of rushes, or a clod of land, Or any wadde of hay that's next to hand, They'll steal. John Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

Know you yonder lump of melancholy, Yonder bundle of sighs, yonder wad of groans?

Heywood, Fair Maid of the Exchange (Works, ed. 1874, II. 17).

2. Specifically, something, as a piece of cloth, paper, or leather, used to hold the powder or bullet, or both, in place in a gun or cartridge. For ordinary double- or single-barreled shot-guns, wads are disks of felt, leather, or pasteboard cut by machinery or by a hand-tool, often indented to allow passage of air in ramming home, and sometimes specially treated with a composition which helps to keep the barrels from fouling. See cut under shot-cartridge.

Wads are punched out of sheets of various materials by cutters fixed in a press. Those most commonly used are made of felts, cardboard, or jute.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 300.

3. In ceram., a small piece of finer clay used to cover the body of an inferior material in some varieties of earthenware; especially, the piece doubled over the edge of a vessel.—Junk wad. See junk-wad.—Selvagee-wad. Same as gravel-wad.

wad<sup>1</sup> (wod), v. t.; pret. and pp. wadded, ppr. wadding. [= G. watten (cf. freq. G. wattiren = D. watteren = Dan. vattere), wad; from the noun.] 1. To form into a wad or into wadding; press together into a mass, as fibrous material.

—2. To line with wadding, as a garment, to give more roundness or fullness to the figure, keep out the cold, render soft, or protect in any way.

A parcel of Superannuated Debauchees, huddled up in Cloaks, Frize Coats and Wadded Gowns.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 300].

The quickest of us walk about well wadded with stupidity.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, xx.

3. To pad; stuff; fill out with or as with wadding.

His skin with sugar being wadded, With liquid fires his entrails burn'd.

J. G. Cooper, tr. of Ver-Vert, iv. (an. 1759).

4. To put a wad into, as the barrel of a gun; also, to hold in place by a wad, as a bullet.

wad<sup>3</sup> (wod), n. A Scotch form of would.

wad<sup>4</sup> (wod), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of wad.

wad<sup>5</sup> (wod), n. [Also wadd; origin obscure.] 1. An impure earthy ore of manganese, which consists of manganese dioxide associated with the oxid of iron, cobalt, or copper. When mixed with linseed-oil for a paint it is apt to take fire. Also called bog-manganese, earthy manganese.—2. Same as plumbago. [Prov. Eng.]

wadable (wä'da-bl), a. [< wade + -able.] That may be waded; fordable. Coles; Halliwel.

wad-cutter (wod'kut'er), n. A device for cutting wads. There are many kinds. The simplest is a circular chisel or gouge struck with a hammer or mallet.

wadding (wod'ing), n. [Verbal n. of wad<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. Wads collectively; stuffing; specifically, carded cotton or wool used to line or stuff

With wafer wae I hear zour plaint.Gil Morris (Child's Ballads, II. 38).waeness (wā'ness), n. [< wae<sup>1</sup> + -ness.] Sadness. Dan. vaffel = Sw. vaffla, wafer (< LG. ?); see waffle, and cf. gauffer, goffer, and gopher from the mod. F.] A thin cake or leaf of paste, generally disk-shaped. Specifically—(a) A cake, apparently corresponding to the modern waffle, and, like it, served hot.

For ar [ere] I haue bred of mele, ofte mote I swete. And ar the comune haue come ynough, many a colde mornynge;

So, ar my wafres ben ywrought, moche wo I tholye. Piers Plowman (B), xiii. 263.Wafres pipynge hot out of the gleede [fire]. Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 193.

(b) A small and delicate cake or biscuit, usually sweetened, variously flavored, and sometimes rolled up.

Thy lips, with age, as any wafer thin. Drayton, Idea, viii.

She should say grace to every bit of meat,

And gape no wider than a wafer's thickness.B. Jonson, Case is Altered, II. 3.(c) A thin circular disk of unleavened bread used in the celebration of the eucharist in the Roman Catholic Church and in many Anglican churches. The wafer derives its form from the fact that the bread of the Jews was ordinarily in this shape; and both the ancient pictured representations and the references in the early patristic literature confirm the opinion that this was the form in use in the church from the apostolic days. Wafers are usually stamped with the form of a cross, crucifix, or Agnus Dei, with the initials I. H. S., or sometimes with a monogram representing the name of Christ. See altar-bread, and oblate, n. 2.The usual bread and wafer, hitherto named singing cakes, which served for the use of the private Masse. Abp. Parker, Injunctions (1559), quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 211.

(d) A thin disk of dried paste, used for sealing letters, fastening documents together, and similar purposes, usually made of flour mixed with water, gum, and some non-poisonous coloring matter. Fancy transparent wafers are made of gelatin and isinglass in a variety of forms.

Perhaps the folds [of a letter] were lovingly connected by a wafer, pricked with a pin, and the direction written in a vile scrawl, and not a word spelt as it should be. Colman, Jealous Wife, i.(e) In artillery, a kind of primer. See primer<sup>2</sup>.Fortunately, the wafers by which the guns are discharged had been removed from the vents. Preble, Hist. Flag, p. 471.(f) In med., a thin circular sheet of dry paste used to facilitate the swallowing of powders. The sheet is moistened, and folded over the powder placed in its center. Sometimes wafers have the form of two watchglass-shaped disks of pasty material, which are made to adhere by moistening their edges, the powder being placed in the hollow between the two.—Medallion wafer, a wafer bearing some design on a ground of a different color.wafer (wā'fer), v. t. [< wafer, n.] 1. To attach by means of a wafer or wafers.This little bill is to be wafered on the shop-door.Dickens, Pickwick, I.

2. To seal or close by means of a wafer.

He . . . wafered his letter, and rushed with it to the neighboring post-office. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xix.wafer-ash (wā'fer-ash), n. The hop-tree, Ptelea trifoliata; so called from its ash-like leaves and flat key-fruit suggesting a wafer. The bark of the root is considerably used as a tonic. waferer (wā'fēr-ēr), n. [< ME. waferer, wafrere; < wafer + -er.] A maker or seller of wafers, either for the table or for eucharistic use. See wafer. Waferers (of both sexes, compare wafer-woman) appear to have been employed as go-betweens in intrigues, probably from the facilities offered by their going from house to house.

Syngenes with harpes, bandes, wafereres
Which been the verray deves offeices
To kindle and blowe the fyr of [lechery].
Chaucer, Pardoner's Tale, l. 17.

wafer-iron (wā'fēr-i-ern), n. [< wafer + iron. (f. wafer-iron.)] A contrivance in which wafers are baked. Its chief part is a pair of thin blades between which the paste is held while it is exposed to heat.

waferstert, n. [ME. wafrestre, waufrestre; < wafer + -ster.] A woman who makes or sells wafers; a female waferer.

"Wyte god," quath a wafrestre, "wist ich the sothe, Ich wolde no further a fot for no freres prechinge."
Piers Plowman (C), viii. 285.

wafer-tongs (wā'fēr-tōngz), n. Same as wafer-iron.

Make the wafer-tongs hot over the hole of a stove or clear fire.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 156.

wafer-woman (wā'fēr-wūm'an), n. A woman who sold wafers. Compare waferer.

'Twas no set meeting certainly, for there was no wafer-woman with her these three days, on my knowledge.
Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, li. 1.

wafery<sup>1</sup> (wā'fēr-i), a. [< wafer + -y.] Like a wafer: as, a wafery thinness.

wafery<sup>2</sup> (wā'fēr-i), n. [Early mod. E. wafrie; < wafer + -y (see -ery).] Wafers collectively; pastry; cakes.

The tartes, wafrie, and iounkettes, that waft to be served and to com in the meat.
J. Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 192. (Davies.)

waff<sup>1</sup> (wāf), n. [< waff<sup>1</sup>, v. Cf. waft, n.] 1. The act of waving. Jamieson.—2. A hasty motion. Jamieson.—3. A slight stroke from any soft body. Jamieson.—4. A sudden or slight ailment: as, a waff o' cauld. Jamieson.—5. A spirit or ghost. Halliwel. [Obsolete or provincial in all uses.]

waff<sup>2</sup> (wāf), v. i. [Also waugh; a var. of wap<sup>3</sup>.] To bark. [Prov. Eng.]

The elder folke and well growne . . . barked like bigge dogges; but the children and little ones waughed as small whelpes.
Holland, tr. of Camden, II. 188. (Davies.)

waff<sup>3</sup>, waf (wāf), a. [See waf, a.] Worthless; low-born; inferior; paltry. [Scotch.]

Is it not an oddlike thing that ilka waf carle in the country has a son and heir, and that the house of Ellangowan is without male succession?
Scott, Guy Mannering, xxxix.

waffle<sup>1</sup> (wof'1), n. [= G. waffel = Dan. vaffel = Sw. vaffla, < D. and LG. wafel, wafer: see wafer.] A particular kind of batter cake baked in waffle-irons and served hot.

We sat at tea in Armstrong's family dining-room; . . . the waitress passed out and in, bringing plates of waffles.
The Century, XXVI. 283.

waffle<sup>2</sup> (wof'1), v. i.: pret. and pp. waffled, ppr. waffling. [Freq. of waff<sup>1</sup>.] To wave; fluctuate. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

waffle<sup>3</sup> (wof'1), v. i. [Freq. of waff<sup>2</sup>.] To bark incessantly. Wright. [Prov. Eng.]

waffle-iron (wof'1-i-ern), n. [= D. wafel-ijzer = G. waffel-eisen; as waffle + iron. Cf. wafer-iron.] An iron utensil for baking waffles over a fire, having two flat halves hinged together, one to contain the batter, the other to cover it.

Waffle-irons.

The iron has handles or projections by which it is readily turned, bringing each side near the fire alternately. The batter is quickly cooked, as the large heating-surface is increased by projections which stud the irons and indent the waffle.

She took down the long-handled waffle-irons, and made a plate of those delicious cakes.
E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxxi.

wafouret, n. An old spelling of wafer.

waft (wāft), v. [A secondary form of wave, through the pp. waved, > waft, pp.: see wave<sup>1</sup>.

Cf. waft<sup>1</sup>.] I. intrans. To be moved or to pass in a buoyant medium; float.

The face of the waters wafting in a storm so wrinkles itself that it makes upon its forehead furrows.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 81.

High on the summit of this dubious cliff
Deucalion wafting moor'd his little skiff.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i. 432.

II. trans. 1. To bear through a fluid or buoyant medium; convey through or as through water or air.

Neither was it thought that they should get any passage at all [to Dordrecht] till the ships at Middleborough were returned into our kingdom, by the force whereof they might be the more strongly wafted over.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 175.

Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole.

2†. To buoy up; cause to float; keep from sinking.

Whether cripples and mutilated persons, who have lost the greatest part of their thighs, will not sink but float, their lungs being able to waft up their bodies, . . . we have not been able to experiment.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 6.

3†. To give notice by something in motion; signal to, as by waving the hand; beckon.

One do I personate of Lord Timon's frame, Whom Fortune with her ivory hand wafts to her.
Shak., T. of A., i. 1. 70.

4†. To cast lightly and quickly; turn.

I met him
With customary compliment; when he,
Wafting his eyes to the contrary, and falling
A lip of much contempt, speeds from me.
Shak., W. T., i. 2. 372.

waft (wāft), n. [< waft, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which wafts; a sweep; a beckoning. Also spelled weft.

There have already been made two wafts from the warder's turret, to intimate that those in the castle are impatient for your return.
Scott, Abbot, xxix.

And the lonely seabird crosses
With one waft of the wing.
Tennyson, The Captain.

2. That which is blown; a breath; a blast; a puff.

D'ye hear, trumpets, when the bride appears, salute her with a melancholy waft.
Vanbrugh, Asop, v. 1.

A waft of peace and calm, like a breeze from paradise, fell upon Malvolti's heart.
J. H. Shorthouse, John Inglesant, xxv.

3. A transient odor or effluvia. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

The vestal fires were perpetual, and the fire of the altar never went out. Spices and wafts of these evils may be found in the sincerest Christians.
Rev. S. Ward, Sermons and Treatises, p. 75.

A strumpet's love will have a waft i' th' end,
And distaste the vessel.
Middleton, Mad World, iv. 3.

4. Naut., a signal displayed from a ship by hoisting a flag rolled up lengthwise with one or more stops. Before the establishment of a universal system of signals, a waft at the flagstaff signified a man overboard, at the peak it indicated a wish to speak, and at a masthead it was used to recall boats. Also dialectally waft and erroneously weft.

waftage (wāft'āj), n. [< waft + -age.] The act of wafting, or the state of being wafted; conveyance or transportation through or over a buoyant medium, as air or water; especially, passage by water.

A ship you sent me to, to hire waftage.
Shak., C. of E., iv. 1. 95.

Not leaving him so much as a poor halfpenny to pay for his waftage.
Randolph, Jealous Lovers, iv. 4.

wafter (wāft'ēr), n. [< waft + -er.] 1. One who or that which wafts.

Charon, oh, Charon,
Thou wafter of the souls to bliss or bane!
Fletcher, Mad Lover, iv. 1.

2†. A boat for passage or transport.

There went before the lord-mayor's barge a foyste for a wafter full of ordinance.
Quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 479.

3†. The master of a passage-boat or transport.

The . . . great master . . . sent vessels called brigantines, for to cause the wafters of the sea to come into Rhodes for the keeping and fortifying of the towne, the which at the first sending came and presented their persons and ships.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 75.

4. A sword having the flat part placed in the usual direction of the edge, blunted for exercises. Meyrick. (Hollivell.)

wafture (wāft'ūr), n. [< waft + -ure.] The act of wafting or waving; a beckoning or gesture.

But, with an angry wafture of your hand,
Gave sign for me to leave you.
Shak., J. C., ii. 1. 246.

Where least expected, the Platonic seed seems blown by the continual wafture of the winds of destiny.
Jour. Spec. Phil., XIX. 51.

wag<sup>1</sup> (wag), v.: pret. and pp. wagged, ppr. wagging. [*< ME. waggen, < OSw. wagga, wag, fluctuate, rock (a cradle), Sw. ragg, rock (a cradle) (cf. Icel. ragg = OSw. wagga, Sw. ragg, a cradle, = Dan. vagge, a cradle, vagge, rock a cradle); a secondary form (parallel with AS. wagan, wag, > ME. waven (see wave<sup>2</sup>) = OHG. wagōn, wecken, cause to move, = Goth. wagan, gawagan, make wag, stir, shake) of AS. wagan = OHG. wegan, move, = Goth. gawigan, shake up, cause to move: see weigh.]*

I. trans. 1. To cause to move up and down, backward and forward, or from side to side, alternately, as a small body jointed or attached to, or connected with, a larger one; cause to move one way or another, as on a pivot or joint, or on or from something by which the body moved is supported; cause to shake, oscillate, or vibrate slightly. From the quick, jerky, or abrupt motion indicated by the word, an idea of playful, sportive, mocking, scornful, or derisive motion is associated with it in certain phrases: as, to wag the head or the finger.

And thanne fondeth the Fende my fruit to destruye
With alle the wyles that he can, and waggeth the rote.
Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 41.

He found him selfe unwist so ill bestad
That him he could not wag. Spenser, F. Q., V. i. 22.

And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads.
Mat. xxvii. 39.

Let ditch-bred wealth henceforth forget to wag
Her base, though golden tail.
Quarles, Emblems, ii. 12.

Let me see the proudest
. . . but wag his finger at thee.
Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 3. 131.

He would plant himself straight before me, and stand wagging that bud of a tail.
Dr. J. Brown, Rab, p. 12.

2†. To nudge.

Ich wondrede what that was, and waggede Conscience; . . .
Quath Conscience, . . . "this is Cristes messenger."
Piers Plowman (C), xlii. 204.

To wag one's chin or jaw. See chin. To wag one's tongue. See tongue.

II. intrans. 1. To move backward and forward, up and down, or from side to side, alternately, as if connected with a larger body by a joint, pivot, or any flexible or loose attachment; oscillate; sway or swing; vibrate: an arrow is said to wag when it vibrates in the air.

Yet saugh I never, by my fader kyn,
How that the hopur [hopper] waggess til and fra.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 119.

Old men are the truest lovers; young men are inconstant, and wag with every wind.
Shirley, Love Tricks, i. 1.

The dreary black sea-weed lolls and wags.
Lovell, Appledore, i.

2. To be in motion or action; make progress; continue a course or career; stir. [Now colloq.]

"Thus we may see," quoth he, "how the world wags."
Shak., As you like it, ii. 7. 23.

They made a pretty good shift to wag along.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

3. To move on or away; be off; depart; pack off; be gone. [Now colloq.]

It is said by manner of a proverbial speech that he who fludes himself well should not wagge.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 194.

At length the busy time begins.
"Come, neighbours, we must wag."

wag<sup>1</sup> (wag), n. [< wag<sup>1</sup>, v.] The act of wagging; a shake; an oscillation.

He . . . introduced himself with a wag of his tail, intimating a general willingness to be happy.
Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 1st ser., p. 87.

wag<sup>2</sup> (wag), n. [Early mod. E. wagge; perhaps short for waghalter, formerly used humorously for 'a rogue' (cf. 'a mad wag' with 'a mad waghalter'), < wag<sup>1</sup>, with ref. to moving the head playfully or derisively: see wag<sup>1</sup>.] 1. One who is given to joking or jesting; a witty or humorous person; one full of sport and humor; a droll fellow. The word seems formerly to have been applied to a person who indulged in coarse, low, or broad humor, or buffoonery, as a practical joker.

Sir Fran. A prodigious civil gentleman, uncle; and yet as bold as Alexander upon occasion.
Unc. Rich. Upon a lady's occasion.

Sir Fran. Ha, ha, you are a wag, uncle.
Vanbrugh, Journey to London, iii. 1.

A wag is the last order even of pretenders to wit and good humour. He has generally his mind prepared to receive some occasion of merriment, but is of himself too empty to draw out any of his own set of thoughts; and therefore laughs at the next thing he meets, not because it is ridiculous, but because he is under a necessity of laughing.
Steele, Tatler, No. 184.

It left Brom no alternative but to draw upon the funds of rustic waggery in his disposition.

wagging (wag'ing), v. [*< ME. waggunge; verbal n. of wag<sup>1</sup>, *v.] A stirring; moving; wagg-ing; oscillation; vibration.

The folk devyne at waggunge of a stre.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1745.

A wanton waggung of your head, thus in feather will teach you.

waggish (wag'ish), a. [< wag<sup>2</sup> + -ish<sup>1</sup>.] 1. Like a wag; waggish in sportive or jocular tricks, antics, sayings, etc.; roguish in merri-ment or good humor; frolicsome.

Jack, thou think'st thyself in the Forecastle, thou'rt so waggish.
Wackerby, Plain Dealer, i. 1.

2. Done, concocted, or manifested in waggery or sport: as, a waggish trick; "waggish good humor." Irring, Sketch-Book, p. 431. = Syn. Jocular, jocosely, humorous, sportive, facetious, droll.

waggishly (wag'ish-li), adv. [< waggish + -ly<sup>2</sup>.] In a waggish manner; in sport.

Let's wanton it a little, and talk waggishly.
B. Jonson, Epicoene, v. 1.

waggishness (wag'ish-nes), n. [< waggish + -ness.] The state or character of being waggish; mischievous sport; wanton merriment; jocularly; also, a joke or trick.

Busbechius reporteth a Christian boy in Constantinople had like to have been stoned for gagging in a waggishness a long-billed fowl.

Bacon, Goodness, and Goodness of Nature (ed. 1887).

waggle (wag'gl), v.; pret. and pp. waggled, ppr. wagglng. [= D. waggelen, totter, waver, = Dan. vakle, shake, vacillate, = MHG. wackeln, totter; freq. of wag<sup>1</sup>. Another freq. form appears in wagger.] I. intrans. To move with a wagging motion; sway or move from side to side; wag.

I know you by the waggling of your head.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 119.

II. trans. 1. To cause to wag frequently and with short motions; move first one way and then the other.

She [Mrs. Botibol] smiles, . . . and if she's very glad to see you, waggles her little hand before her face as if to blow you a kiss, as the phrase is.

Thackeray, Book of Snobs, xviii.

2. To whip; beat; overcome; get the better of. [Slang.]

waggle (wag'gl), n. [*< waggle, *v.] A sudden, short movement first to one side and then to the other; a wagging.

A curious waggle of the focussed image.
Nature, XXXVIII. 224.

waggon, waggonage, etc. See wagon, etc.
wag-halter (wag'hāl'tēr), n. [*< wag<sup>1</sup>, v., + obj. halter<sup>2</sup>. Cf. wag<sup>2</sup>.*] One who wags (or wags in) a halter; one likely to come to the gallows; a rascal; a thief; chiefly humorous.

I can tell you I am a mad wag-halter.

For they bene like foule wagmoires overgrast.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

wagnak, n. Same as baag-nouk.

Wagnerian (vāg'nē-ri-ān), a. [< Wagner (see def.) + -ian. The G. surname Wagner is from the noun wagner, a wagon-maker, cartwright, = E. wagoner.] Of or pertaining to any one named Wagner. Specifically—(a) Of or pertaining to Rudolph Wagner (1805–64), a German anatomist and physiologist. (b) Pertaining or relating to Richard Wagner (1813–83), a celebrated German musical composer, or to his music-dramas; characterized by the ideas or the style of Wagner. See Wagnerism.—Wagnerian corpuscles, the tactile corpuscles of Wagner. See corpuscle.—Wagnerian spot, the germinal spot. See nucleolus, 1.

Wagnerianism (vāg'nē-ri-ān-izm), n. [< Wagnerian + -ism.] Wagnerism. Contemporary Rev., LI. 448.

Wagnerism (vāg'nēr-izm), n. [< Wagner + -ism.] 1. The art theory of Richard Wagner, especially as concerns the musical drama, including the general style of composition based on that theory. Among the many characteristics of the theory are these: the choice of a general subject in which the mythical and heroic elements are prominent; the amalgamation of poetry, music, action, and scenic effect into the most intimate union as equally important cooperating elements; the desertion of the conventionalities of the common Italian opera, especially of its sharply defined and contrasted movements and its tendency to the display of mere virtuosity; the abundant use of leading motives as a means to continuous and reiterated emotional effect; the immense elaboration of the orchestral parts, so that in them is furnished an unbroken presentation of or commentary on the entire plot; and the free use of new and remarkable means of effect, both scenic and instrumental. The Wagnerian ideal is often called (sometimes derisively) "the music of the future," from the title of one of Wagner's essays. While Wagnerism is best exemplified in the great dramas of Wagner himself, its qualities may be seen more or less in almost all the dramatic music of the last half of this century.

2. The study or imitation of the music of Richard Wagner.

Wagnerist (vāg'nēr-ist), n. [< Wagner + -ist.] An adherent of Richard Wagner's musical methods; an admirer of his works. Also Wagnerite.

wagnerite<sup>1</sup> (vāg'nēr-it), n. [Named after F. M. von Wagner (1768–1851), head of the Bavarian mining department.] A transparent mineral having a vitreous luster, wine-yellow or honey-yellow in color. It is a fluorophosphate of magnesium.

Wagnerite<sup>2</sup> (vāg'nēr-it), n. [< Wagner + -ite<sup>2</sup>.] Same as Wagnerist. The American, XVII. 110.

Wagner's corpuscles. See Wagnerian and corpuscle.

wagon, waggon (wag'on), n. [Early mod. E. also in pl. wagons; < D. wagen, a wagon or wain, = AS. wāgn, E. wain; see wain<sup>1</sup>. Hence F. wagon, a railroad-car.] 1. A four-wheeled vehicle; a wain; specifically, a four-wheeled vehicle designed for the transport of heavy loads, or (of lighter build) for various purposes of business, as the delivery of goods purchased at a shop, or of express packages; loosely, such a vehicle, similar to the lighter business wagons, used for pleasure. The typical heavy wagon is a strong vehicle drawn by two or three horses yoked abreast, the fore wheels much smaller than the hind pair, and their axle swiveled to the body of the wagon to facilitate turning.

They trussed all their harness in wagons.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I. lxii.

Reeling with grapes, red waggon chokes the way.
Byron, Beppo, st. 42.

Some of the inland traffic was still done by means of pack-horses. . . . But there were also waggon, which, by the divine permission, started for every town of note in England.

J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 166.

2. An open four-wheeled vehicle for the conveyance of goods on railways. [Great Britain.] —3t. A chariot.

Then to her yron wagon she betakes,
And with her beares the fowle wellfavoured witch.

Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 28.

O Proserpina,
For the flowers now, that frighted thou let'st fall
From Dis's waggon!

Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 118.

4. A tool for trimming the edges of gold-leaf to size for a book. It consists of a frame carrying four edges of cane for cutting the gold-leaf, which does not adhere to cane as it would to metal. E. H. Knight.

5. In mining, a car; a mine-car.—Conestoga wagon, a type of broad-wheeled wagon for the transportation of merchandise, made at Conestoga in Pennsylvania, originally for freighting goods over the deep soil of southern and western Pennsylvania; afterward it became the common vehicle of settlers going out on the prairies.

The road seemed actually lined with Conestoga wagons, each drawn by six stalwart horses and laden with farm produce.

Josiah Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 206.

Gipsy wagon. See Gipsy.—Skeleton wagon. See skeleton.

wagon (wag'on), v. t. [< wagon, n.] To transport, convey, or carry in a wagon: as, to wagon goods. [Colloq.]

Burnside having answered for the safety of the road, it had been determined to wagon a portion of the [bridge] equipages to Fredericksburg.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), II. 563.

wagonage, waggonage (wag'on-āj), n. [< wagon + -age.] 1. Money paid for carriage or conveyance by wagon.

Wagonage, indeed, seems to the commissariat an article not worth economizing.

Jefferson, To Patrick Henry (Correspondence, I. 158).

2. A collection of wagons.

wagon-bed (wag'on-bed), n. Same as wagon-bed.

In the grassy piazza two men had a humble show of figs and cakes for sale in their wagon-beds.

Hovells, The Century, XXX. 672.

wagon-boiler (wag'on-boi'lēr), n. A kind of steam-boiler having originally a semicylindrical top, the ends and sides vertical, and the bottom flat, thus having the shape of a wagon covered with an arched tilt. Improved forms have the sides and bottom slightly curved inward.

wagon-bow (wag'on-bō), n. A bent slat of wood used, generally in combination with others, to support the top or cover of a wagon.

wagon-box (wag'on-boks), n. The part of a wagon mounted upon the wheels and axles, and used to contain the freight or passengers. Also wagon-bed.

wagon-brake (wag'on-brāk), n. A brake used on a wagon.

wagon-lock (wag'on-lok), n. In a vehicle, a device for retarding motion in going downhill. It operates as a brake by bringing a shoe to bear against the face of one rear wheel, or both. It differs essentially from a wagon-drag or wheel-drag used for the same purpose, the drag being a shoe placed under one of the wheels. A chain used to prevent a wheel from turning in descending a hill, by locking the wheel to the body of the wagon, is essentially a wagon-locking device, but the term in the United States always implies some form of friction hand-brake. Wagon-locks are used on stages and other vehicles in mountainous districts, and are preferred to the wheel-

On yche half forto heede, that no harme fall.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 6265.

2. One of a body of musicians, especially in the seventeenth century in England. Originally the waiters seem to have been watchmen who sounded horns, or in some other noisy way announce their being on watch. Bands of musicians seem to have borne the name generally at a later time, and it is still preserved in England, as applied to persons who sing out of doors at Christmas time, and seek gratuities from house to house.

A waite, that nightelye from Mychelmas to Shreve Hert lye pipethe the waite within this courte fower tymes. . . . Also this yeoman waite, at the makinge of

2. One of a body of musicians, especially in the seventeenth century in England. Originally the waiters seem to have been watchmen who sounded horns, or in some other noisy way announce their being on watch. Bands of musicians seem to have borne the name generally at a later time, and it is still preserved in England, as applied to persons who sing out of doors at Christmas time, and seek gratuities from house to house.

Romer, quoted in Chambers's Book of Days, II. 743.

We will have the city waites down with us, and a noise of trumpets.

Shirley, Witty Fair One, iv. 2.

There is scarce a young man of any fashion who does not make love with the town music. The waites often help him through his courtship; and my friend Banister has told me he was proffered five hundred pounds by a young fellow to play but one winter under the window of a lady.

Tatler, No. 222.

A strain of music seemed to break forth in the air just below the window. I listened, and found it proceeded from a band which I concluded to be the waites from some neighbouring village.

Irving, Sketch Book, p. 253.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, ii. 1.

2. The act of watching or keeping vigil, especially for a solemn or festive purpose; a vigil; especially, an annual festival kept in commemoration of the completion and dedication of a parish church; hence, a merry-making; a festive gathering. The wake was kept by an all-night watch in the church. Tents were erected in the churchyard to supply refreshments to the crowd on the following day, which was kept as a holiday. Through the large attendance from neighboring parishes at wakes, devotion and piety were gradually diminished, until they ultimately became mere fairs or markets, characterized by merry-making and often disgraced by indulgence and riot. In popular usage this word has the same meaning as rigil.

The wake or revel of country parishes was, originally, the day of the week on which the church had been dedicated; afterward, the day of the year. In 1536 an act of convocation appointed that the wake should be held in every parish on the same day, namely, the first Sunday in October, but it was disregarded. Wakes are expressly mentioned in the "Book of Sports" of Charles I. among the sports which should be observed. The wake appears to have been also held on the Sunday after the day of dedication; or, more usually, on the day of the saint to whom the church was dedicated. In Ireland it is called the patron day. Brand, Popular Antiquities.

3. An all-night watch by the body of the dead, before burial. This custom seems to be of Celtic origin, and is now characteristic of Ireland, or of the Irish in other countries; but it was formerly observed in Scotland and Wales. It probably originated from a superstition that the body might be carried off by invisible spirits, or from a more rational fear of injury to it from wild beasts. In early literature it has the name of hela-wake, hela-wake. The wake was originally a combination of mourning for the dead and rejoicing in his memory and for his deliverance, but in later times has often degenerated into a scene of wild grief and gross orgies. See hela-wake.

The late-wake is a ceremony used at funerals. The evening after the death of any person, the relations and friends of the deceased meet at the house, attended by a bagpipe or fiddle; the nearest of kin, be it wife, son, or daughter, opens a melaucholy ball, dancing and greeting, i. e. crying violently, at the same time; and this continues till daylight, but with such gambols and frolics among the younger part of the company that the loss which occasioned them is often more than supplied by the consequences of that night. If the corpse remain unburied for two nights, the same rites are renewed.
Pennant, Tour in Scotland, p. 112.

4. To arouse; excite; put in motion or action.

II. trans. 1. To rouse from sleep; awake; arouse. Hence, to be awakened by a redoubt or impression.

See hela-wake.

How that the hela-wake was y holde
At thilke night. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I. 2100.

The late-wake is a ceremony used at funerals. The evening after the death of any person, the relations and friends of the deceased meet at the house, attended by a bagpipe or fiddle; the nearest of kin, be it wife, son, or daughter, opens a melaucholy ball, dancing and greeting, i. e. crying violently, at the same time; and this continues till daylight, but with such gambols and frolics among the younger part of the company that the loss which occasioned them is often more than supplied by the consequences of that night. If the corpse remain unburied for two nights, the same rites are renewed.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

wakon-bird (wā'kon-bērd), n. A fabulous bird among the American Indians, or some actual bird regarded with superstition or used in religious ceremonial. Various unsuccessful attempts have been made to identify it. The quetzal of Central America has been sometimes so called, or regarded as one of the wakens. Compare sunbird (e), and thunder-bird, 2.

Walachian, a. and n. See Wallachian.

walawat, interj. Same as walloway.

Walcheren fever. A severe form of malarial fever: so called from Walcheren, an island of the Netherlands, where it at one time prevailed. During the Walcheren expedition, in 1809, the English lost thousands of troops by a fever caused (as was believed) by the badness of the water, this loss leading to the entire failure of the expedition.

Walchia (wāl'kī-ā), n. A generic name given by Sternberg (in 1825) to a fossil plant very abundant in, and characteristic of, the Permian series. This plant belongs to the Coniferæ, and has a close resemblance in its general appearance to the Aracariæ; but, since its organs of fructification are unknown, its position has not as yet been exactly determined. It is in certain respects allied to Brachyphyllum and Pagiophyllum, conifers found in the Triassic and Jurassic. Schenk (1884) makes a separate division (the Walchieæ) of certain conifers, in which he includes the genera Walchia, Umanina, and Pagiophyllum of Heer (Pachyphyl- lum of Saporta). Umanina is also a characteristic plant of the Permian, being found in numerous localities in the Kupferschiefer; while Pagiophyllum occurs in the Trias of the United States, in various places in Europe in the Triassic and Jurassic, and in India in the Gondwana series.

Waldensian (wōl-den'sian), a. and n. [< Also Valdensian (see def.); < Waldenses + -ian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Waldensians or Waldenses.

The important point of the origin of the Waldensian Church is clearly established, being referred to Waldo, in opposition to the fanciful theories which tried to carry it back through mysterious paths to the primitive Christian times.

The Academy, No. 888, p. 320.

II. n. A member of a reforming body of Christians, followers of Peter Waldo (Waldo) of Lyons, formed about 1170. Its chief seats were in the alpine valleys of Piedmont, Dauphiné, and Provence (hence the French name Vandois des Alpes, or Vandois). The Waldenses joined the Reformation movement, and were often severely persecuted, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Waldensian church in Italy now numbers about 20,000 members.

waldhorn (wōld'hörn), n. [G., < wald, forest, + horn, horn; see wold<sup>1</sup> and horn.] The old hunting-horn, without valves, from which the modern orchestral or French horn was derived; the corno di caccia. See horn.

Waldsteinia (wōld-stī'nī-ā), n. [NL. (Willdenow, 1799), named after Count Franz A. von Waldstein (1759-1823), a German botanist.] A genus of rosaceous plants, of the tribe Potentilleæ. It is characterized by flowers with numerous triseriate rigid persistent stamens, and two to six carpels, their styles not elongated. The 4 species are natives of central and eastern Europe, Siberia, and North America. They are herbs with creeping or stoloniferous stems, suggesting the strawberry-plant, bearing alternate long-petioled leaves, which are entire, cleft, or compound, sometimes with three to five crenate or incised leaflets, and large membranous stipules. The yellow flowers are borne, two to five together, on a bracted scape, often with curving pedicels. W. fragarioides is the barren strawberry of the United States, widely diffused through northern and mountainous parts of the Eastern and Central States.

walshnut. 1. The fruit of the nut-bearing tree Juglans regia; also, the tree itself, or its wood. The walnut-tree is native from the Caucasus and Armenia to the mountains of northern India, and is extensively cultivated, and in some places naturalized, in temperate Europe. It grows from 40 to 60 or even 100 feet high, with a massive trunk and broad spreading top, and bears pinnate leaves with few smooth leaflets. It produces the well-known sweet-seeded nuts of this name, in America distinguished as English walnuts. These are surrounded with a thin, brittle, and easily separated husk. The shell is thin in different degrees, or in the wild state thicker. The kernel yields some 50 per cent. of oil, which is largely expressed in France and other parts of Europe, as also in Asia. That of the first pressing is used for food, like olive-oil, though ranked less highly; that of the second pressing, called pressed-oil, the cake having been submitted to boiling water, is more siccative even than linseed-oil, and hence is by some artists the most highly esteemed of all oils; it is a good lamp-oil, and is available for making soft-soap, etc. The whole fruit when quite young makes a good pickle. The shell of a large variety, called double walnut, is used in France for making purses, cases for jewelry, etc. The leaves and the hull of the fruit are used in Europe for various medicinal purposes. Walnut-wood is light, tough, and handsome, plain or with a burr; the introduction of mahogany it was the leading cabinet-wood of Europe, and is still preferred to all other wood for gunstocks.

Walpurgis nacht*, so called with ref. to the day of St. Walpurgis, Walburgis, or Walpurga, the name of an abbess who emigrated from England to Germany in the 8th century.] The night before the first day of May, on which, according to German popular superstition, witches are said to ride on broomsticks, he-goats, etc., to some appointed rendezvous, especially the Brocken in the Harz Mountains, where they hold high festival with their master the devil.

walpurge (wōl-pēr'jit), n. A hydrated arsenate of uranium and bismuth, occurring in thin scale-like crystals of a yellow color. It is found with other uranium minerals at Neustädtel in Saxony. Also walpurge.

walrus (wōl'rus), n. [= D. walrus = G. walross, < Sw. walross = Dan. walross, lit. 'whale-horse,' equiv. to leel. walross-healr = AS. hors-hææl, lit. 'horse-whale,' a name prob. alluding to the noise made by the animal, somewhat resembling a neigh, = Sw. Dan. walrask: see whale and horse.] Cf. whalefish and narwhal.] Any member of the family Trichechidae (or Rosmaridae); a very large pinniped carnivorous mammal, related to the seals, having in the male enormous canine teeth protruding like tusks from the upper jaw. The common walrus, T. rosarius, the morse, sea horse, sea-ox, or sea-cow, attains a total length of 10 to 12 feet in the full-grown male; individuals are reported to exceed 14 feet; a more nearly average length is 8 to 10 feet, with a girth of about as much. A weight of 2,500 to 3,000 pounds is acquired by old bulls, with a yield of 500 pounds of blubber. The whole length of the canines is about 2 feet, when they are full grown, with a projection of 15 inches or more. These teeth are used in digging for the clams which form the principal food of the animal, and in climbing over uneven surfaces of rock or ice. A walrus 12 feet long has the fore flippers 2 feet long by about 1 foot broad; the flukes each about this length, but 2 feet in extreme breadth when pressed out flat. The mammae of the female are two pairs, respectively abdominal and inguinal. Young and mid-aged individuals of both sexes are covered with a short coarse hair of a yellowish brown color, deepening into dark reddish-brown on the belly and at the bases of the limbs. Old animals, especially the bulls, become almost naked, and the skin grows heavily wrinkled and plaited, especially on the fore quarters. In the glacial period the walrus ranged in North America southward on the Atlantic coast to South Carolina. There is no evidence of its existence in New England since about 1550; from this date to 1600 it lived south to Nova Scotia. It now inhabits some parts of Labrador, shores of Hudson's Bay, and arctic regions as far north as Eskimos live or explorers have gone. It has been found in Scotland of late years, and on or off the arctic coast of Europe and Asia, especially in Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla. It is readily captured, and the systematic destruction to which it has long been subjected has materially diminished its numbers in many different places. The blubber yields a valuable oil, from the hide a very tough and durable leather is made; and the tusks yield a superior ivory. The walrus of the North Pacific is now generally thought to be specifically distinct, and is known as T. or R. obesus, and entomologist.] A curious genus of moths, of the family Tineidae, having the fore wings with large thick tufts of scales, and the submedian and internal nervures obsolete. Only one species, W. amorpha, is known. Its larva makes a gall on the stems of the false indigo, Amorpha fruticosa, and the waltz (wāltz), n. [= F. valse (> E. valse), < G. walzer, a round dance, waltz, < walzen, roll: see walt, v.] 1. A round dance, probably of Bohemian origin, which has been extraordinarily popular since the latter part of the eighteenth century. It is danced by couples, the partners in each couple moving together in a series of whirling steps, or either advancing continuously in the same direction, or varying this with "reversing" or turning the opposite way. The regular form of the waltz is known as the trois-temps - the more rapid form deux-temps containing six steps to every two of the other. The derivation of the waltz is disputed, the French often claiming it descended from the volta, and the Germans from the all-mande; but it is probably a development of the slow and simple landler. Its popularity has decidedly overshadowed that of all other fashionable dances.

Wandering Jew. (a) A legendary character who, according to one version (that of Matthew Paris, dating from the thirteenth century), was a servant of Pilate, by name Caiaphas, and gave Christ a blow when he was led out of the palace to execution. According to a later version he was a cobbler named Ahasuerus, who refused Christ permission to sit down and rest when he passed his house on the way to Golgotha. Both legends agree in the sentence pronounced by Christ on the offender, "Thou shalt wander on the earth till I return." A prey to remorse, he has since wandered from land to land without being able to find a grave. The story has been turned to account by many poets and novelists. (b) A plant-name: (1) The beefsteak or strawberrygeranium, Saxifraga sarmatensis; locally, the Kenilworth ivy, Linaria cymbalaria. (Great Britain.) (2) One of two or three house-plants, as Zehria pendula (Tradescantia zebrina), which are planted in baskets or vessels of water, whence they spread in a straggling fashion. Z. pendula has lance-ovate or oblong leaves with two broad silvery stripes. Another sort has bright green leaves.

The term seems to have been originally applied to the armed assemblies of freemen; and there is possibly an allusion to a practice of taking up or "touching" the arms. Wapentake is still a territorial division in Yorkshire.

It is written that King Allured, or Alfred, who then reigned, did deuide the realme into shires, and the shires into hundrethes, and the hundrethes into rapes or wapentakes, and the wapentakes into tithings. See that tenn tithings made an hundrethe, and five made a lathe or wapentake. Spenser, State of Ireland.

The wapentake is found only in the Anglian districts. . . . To the north of these districts the shires are divided into wards, and to the south into hundreds. Hence the wapentake may be a relic of Scandinavian occupation.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 45.

wapiti (wop'i-ti), n. [Also wappiti, wapite, wappite; < Amer. Ind. (Cree) wapituk, 'white deer,' said to designate the Rocky Mountain goat, Haploceros montanus; used as E., and also in the NL. form Cervus wapiti, by B. S. Barton, in 1809, for the animal defined.] The North American stag or elk, Cervus canadensis, which is the North American representative of the stag or red deer of Europe, and resembles the latter, though it is much larger and of a stronger make, being one of the largest living representatives of the family Cervidae. Wapiti is chiefly a book-name of this deer, which has generally been known since about 1809 as the elk—a name applied in Europe to a very different animal, corresponding to that called moose in North America. (See elk (with cut), moose, stag.) The full-grown male wapiti may exceed a height of 16 hands at the withers, and acquire a weight of more than 1,000 pounds, though not averaging over 600; the form is short for its stature. The coat is some shade of yellowish-gray or brownish-gray, darkening to chestnut-brown on the head, Dan Chaucer, the first warbler. Tennyson, Fair Women.

2. Specifically, any one of a great number of small oscine passerine birds, or dentiostrial inessorial birds, of different families and many different genera, of both the Old World and the New. Especially—(a) A bird of the group composing the family Sylviidae, or Old World warblers, with scarcely any representatives in America. This is one of the most extensive and varied groups of its grade in ornithology, now generally rated as only a subfamily (Sylviinae) of Turdidae. These warblers are all small, active, sprightly birds, and many are remarkable for the clearness, sweetness, and flexibility of their song. Among typical warblers of the subfamily Sylviinae may be noted the species of Sylvia, the leading genus, as the blackcap and whitethroat; of Melospiza, as the Parrot-warbler; of Reinholdia, as the goldcrest; of Phylloscopus, as the willow-warbler; of Aedon, as the rufous warbler; of Hypothymis, as the icterine warbler; of Acrocephalus, as the reed- or sedge-warbler; of Locustella, as the grasshopper-warbler; of Cettia, as Cetti's warbler. Besides these, the accentor or hedge-sparrow, the nightingale (Dusky luscinia), the redbreast (Erythrura rubecula), the bluethroat, redstart, whinchat, stonechat, etc., have been brought under the definition of warbler, as members of the sylvine group. (b) In the United States, a bird of a different family, the American warblers, Dendroica or Mniotiltidae, a smaller and more compact group than the Sylviidae, though the species are still very numerous and diversified. Few of them are noted for musical ability. The leading representatives of the American warblers are the numerous wood-warblers of the genus Dendroica; the worm-eating warbler, Helminthophaga; the creeping warblers, Mniotilta and Parula; the ground-warblers, as Geothlypis; the chat, Icteria; the water-thrushes, Seiurus; the fly-catching warblers, Myiodynastes, Setophaga, and many others of tropical America.

3. In bagpipe music, an appoggiatura, or similar melodic embellishment.

In the music performed upon this instrument (the bagpipe) the players introduce among the simple notes of the tune a kind of appoggiatura, consisting of a great number of rapid notes of peculiar embellishment, which they term warblers. Encyc. Brit., III. 235.

Adelaide's warbler, Dendroica adelaidæ (Baird, 1865), the representative in Porto Rico of Grace's and of the yellow-throated warbler.—African warbler (Latham, 1783), the type species of the genus Spharopicus, S. africanus. Also called spotted yellow flycatcher by Latham, formerly Muscicapa nra, Motacilla or Sylvia africana, etc., and also placed in the genus Drymæcia by some authors.—Alpine warbler (Latham, 1783), a kind of hedge-warbler, Accentor alpinus, of central and southern Europe, occasionally found in Great Britain. This bird was also called collared star by Latham the same year, having been described by Scopoli in 1769 as Sturnus collaris.—Aquatic warbler (Latham, 1783), one of the reed-warblers, probably Acrocephalus aquaticus; formerly called Sylvia or Salicivora or Calamobola aquatica.—Audubon's warbler, Dendroica auduboni, the western representative of the yellow-rump or myrtle-bird, and equally abundant. It differs chiefly in having the throat yellow instead of white. Also called western yellow-rump.—Autumnal warbler, the young of the bay-breasted warbler, mistaken for a distinct species. A. Wilson, 1811.—Azure warbler, the cerulean warbler.—Babbling warbler (Latham, 1783), the lesser whitethroat, Sylvia curruca. See whitethroat, l. 1.—Bachman's warbler [named after the American naturalist John Bachman (1790-1874)], Helminthophaga bachmani of the southern United States and some of the West Indies. (Audubon, 1834.) It is one of the swamp-warblers, and still very rare, though it has been quite recently found to be common in some localities.

—Barred warbler, Sylvia nisoria of Europe, Asia, and Africa.—Bay-breasted warbler, Dendroica castanea of eastern parts of North America. The adult male has the whole breast chestnut.—Belted warbler, the yellow-rumped warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785.—Black-and-white warbler, the creeping warbler, Mniotilta varia; more fully called black-and-white creeping warbler or creeper, also white pull warbler. See cut under Mniotilta.—Black-and-yellow warbler, Dendroica maculosa. See cut under spotted.—Blackburnian warbler, Dendroica blackburniæ, the prometheus warbler, in adult plumage extensively black variegated with white, the breast and some parts about the head of a flaming orange. It is the most richly colored of the warblers, and is common in many parts of North America. It was named by Latham in 1783 after a Mrs. Blackburn of London.—Black-capped warbler, the blackcap, Sylvia (offener Curruca) atricapilla, of nearly all Europe, and parts of Asia and Africa.—Black-headed warbler, the American redstart, Setophaga ruticilla. See cut under redstart. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785.—Black-poll warbler, Dendroica striata, when adult having the whole crown black, the upper parts olivaceous streaked with black, and the under parts white streaked with black along the sides. In young plumage it is hardly to be distinguished from the bay-breasted warbler. It is very wide-ranging, from Greenland and Alaska through most of America (probably to Chili). It was originally described in 1772 by J. R. Forster from Hudson's Bay as the striped fly- catcher.—Black-throated blue warbler, Dendroica cerulea, of eastern North America, remarkable for the unusual difference of the sexes in plumage. The male is blue, white below, with black throat and a peculiar white space on the wing; the female is chiefly greenish above and yellowish below, with traces of the characteristic wing-mark.—Black-throated gray warbler, Dendroica nigrescens, of western parts of the United States and Mexico. The adult male is bluish-ash above with a few black streaks, below white streaked on the sides with black, the head black with white stripes and a small bright-yellow spot before the eye.—Black-throated green warbler, Dendroica virens, one of the most abundant wood-warblers of eastern North America. The adult male is olivaceous-green above, below extensively black, with much golden yellow on the sides of the head, and white on the wings and tail. The length is 5 inches. It is one of a group of warblers having several representatives in western North America. See cut under Dendroica.—Black-throated warbler, the black-throated blue warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785.—Blanford's warbler, Sylvia blanfordi, of which only one specimen is known, from Abyssinia. See bohm.—Bloody-side or bloody-sided warbler, (a) The chestnut-sided warbler. Pennant, 1785. (b) One of the golden warblers, Dendroica ruficapilla, of the West Indies. Latham, 1783.—Blue-eyed yellow warbler, the summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva.—Blue golden-winged warbler, Helminthophaga chrysoptera, a common swamp-warbler of the eastern United States and Canada. See cut under Helminthophaga.—Blue-green warbler, the cerulean warbler in immature plumage, or the female of that species.—Blue Mountain warbler, an American warbler so named by A. Wilson in 1812, and never since identified. It was found in the Blue Mountains of Pennsylvania.—Blue-throated warbler (Latham, 1783), the bluethroat, originally described by Edwards in 1743 as the bluethroat redstart, later variously called Motacilla suecica, Sylvia suecica, Sylvia cyanecula, Cyanecula suecica, etc., all of which names are shared by a related species or variety. See cut under bluethroat.

Blue-winged yellow warbler, Helminthophaga pinus, a common swamp-warbler of the eastern parts of the United States, originally described by Edwards (before Linnaeus) as the pine-creeper.—Blue yellow-backed warbler, Parula (or Comptosia) americana. See Parula.—Bonaparte's fly-catching warbler, the young of the Canadian fly-catching warbler, mistaken by Audubon for a different species in 1831, and dedicated to Prince Charles Lucien Bonaparte (1803-57).—Booted warbler, a tree-warbler, Hypothymis caligata.—Bourbon warbler (Latham, 1783), the yellow-rumped creeper (Latham, 1781); a white-eye or silver-eye, Zosterops borbonica, peculiar to the Island of Réunion.—Bowman's warbler, Sylvia mystacea of Persia, Palestine, and Abyssinia.—Bush-warblers, the members of the genus Cettia, having only ten rectrices. There are about 12 species, with one exception confined to Asia. The exception is Cetti's warbler, C. cetti, which extends throughout the Mediterranean region, and was originally described in 1776, by the naturalist whose name it bears, as usignuolo di fiume, which became the buscarle of Buffon and Daubenton. See cut under Cettia.—Caffrarian warbler (Latham, 1783), the so-called red-tailed thrush of Latham (1783), formerly Motacilla or Sylvia caffra, now known as Cossypha caffra (and Bessomoris phoenicurus).—Canadian fly-catching warbler, Myiodynastes canadensis, abundant in eastern parts of North America. Also called Canada and spotted flycatcher. The upper parts are bluish-ash variegated with black, and the under parts are yellow with black streaks on the breast.—Canadian warbler. (a) The black-throated blue warbler. (b) The Canadian fly-catching warbler.—Cape May warbler, Dendroica tigrina, formerly Sylvia maritima; so named by A. Wilson, in 1812, from a locality in New Jersey where he found it. In full plumage it is one of the handsomest of the wood-warblers, and has peculiarities which have caused a genus (Perisoreglossa) to be based upon it.—Carbonated warbler, an American warbler so named by Audubon in 1831, and never since identified. More fully called carbonated swamp-warbler, also duky warbler.—Cerulean warbler. See cerulean.—Cetti's warbler, one of the bush-warblers.—Chestnut-bellied warbler (Latham, 1783), an Asiatic redstart, Ruticilla (formerly Sylvia erythrogastra).—Chestnut-sided warbler, Dendroica pennsylvanica of the eastern United States and Canada, having, when adult, the under parts pure-white with a chain of chestnut streaks along each side, and the crown rich-yellow.—Chiff-chaff warbler, Phylloscopus rufus. See cut under chiff-chaff.—Children's warbler, the female or young summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva.—Audubon, 1831.—Cingalese warbler (Latham, 1783), the green warbler of Brown (1776) and yellow-bellied creeper of Latham (1787), one of the Nectariniidae, Anthothreptes phoenicotes, extending from Bhutan to Malacca and the Sunda Islands, but not known in Ceylon.—Cisticoline warbler, a grass-warbler; one of a very large and loose group of Old World warbler-like birds, of which the leading genera, in numbers of species, are Cisticola or Drymæcia, with twelve rectrices, and Prinia with ten (as in the genus Cettia). The group is badly defined, and is now generally thrown into the so-called ornithological waste-basket (Tilimelidae). Most of the species of the three genera named have been placed in each of the others, and Drymæcia has practically included the members of both. Among notable members of the group are the tailor-warblers or tailor-birds (see Orthotomus, Sutoria, and tailor-bird, with cuts), with twelve rectrices, and the species of Suya (which see), with ten rectrices. The group is best developed in Africa and Asia. Cisticola cursorians (with thirty technical synonyms) extends from southern Europe, throughout Africa and through the warmer parts of Asia, to the Indo-Malayan islands; C. subruficapilla (with more than thirty synonyms) inhabits most of Africa.—Citrine warbler (Latham, 1783), the remarkable New Zealand Acanthisitta chloris. See Xenicidae.—Citron warbler, the summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva. Swainson and Richardson, 1831.—Connecticut warbler, Oporornis agilis, a ground-warbler so named by Wilson in 1812, common in eastern parts of the United States, especially in the fall.—Creeping warblers, the American warblers of the genera Mniotilta and Parula. See cut under Mniotilta.—Dartford warbler (Latham, 1783), the Motacilla undata of Boddaert, 1783 (based on the pittehou of Daubenton, Planches Enluminées, 665, George!" was the war-cry of England, "Mont-jolie Saint Denis!" the war-cry of France.

Faithful to his noble vow, his war-cry filled the air;
"Be honour'd aye the bravest knight, beloved the fairest!"
Scott, Roman of the East (trans.).

6. The state of being under a guard; confinement under a guard, warder, or keeper; custody; confinement; jail.

He would be punished and committed to ward.
Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

He put them in ward in the house of the captain of the guard. Gen. xl. 3.

7. Guardianship; control or care of a minor.

Item, my Lord of Hungerford has written to me for to have the ward of Robert Monpynson's sone, wher of I am agreed that he schal (have) hit like as I has wreten to hym in a letter, of the whiche I send zow a cope closed here in. Paston Letters, I. 94.

It is inconvenient in Ireland that the wards and marriages of gentlemen's children should be in the disposal of any of those lords. Spencer, State of Ireland.

8. The state of being under the care, control, or protection of a guardian; the condition of being under guardianship.

I must attend his majesty's command, to whom I am now in ward. Shaks., All's Well, i. 1. 5.

The decay of estates in ward by the abuse of the powers of wardship. R. W. Dizon, Hist. Church of Eng., ii.

9. One who or that which is guarded; specifically, a minor or person under guardianship. (a)
In feudal law, the heir of the king's tenant in capite, during his nonage. (b) In British law, a minor under the protection of the Court of Chancery, generally called a ward in Chancery, or a ward of court. To marry a ward of court without consent of the court is a contempt. The court has power, if the ward has property, to appoint a guardian, if there is none, and to supervise his administration, and remove him.

My lord, he's a great ward, wealthy, but simple;
His parts consist in acres. Middleton, Women Beware Women, iii. 2.

(c) In U. S. law, a minor for whom a guardian is appointed.

10. A division. (a) A band or company.

full wele cowde hem guyde, and were in his company iijijth men wele horsed. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 151.

Somerset, expecting to have been followed by Lord Wenlock, who commanded what was called "the middle ward" of that army, allowed himself to be lured into a pursuit. J. Gardner, Richard III., i.

(c) A certain division, section, or quarter of a town or city, such as is under the charge of an alderman, or as is constituted for the convenient transaction of local public business through committees appointed by the inhabitants, or merely for the purposes of elections.

Throughout the trembling city placed a guard,
Dealing an equal share to every ward. Dryden.

(d) A territorial division of some counties in Great Britain, as Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire in Scotland, and Northumberland and Cumberland in the north of England. (e) The division of a forest. (f) One of the apartments into which a hospital is divided: as, a fever ward;
a convalescent ward.

11. A curved ridge of metal inside a lock, forming an obstacle to the passage of a key which has not a corresponding notch; also, the notch or slot in the web or bit of a key into which such a ridge fits when the key is applied.
The wards of a lock are often named according to their shapes: as, L-ward, T-ward. The wards are usually made of sheet-metal bent into a round form, and hence are sometimes termed wheels. See cut under pick, 4.

A key
That winds through secret wards.
Wordsworth, Memory.

Casual, casualty, condemned ward. See the qualifying words. Casualty of wards. See casualty.

Isolating ward, a room in a hospital set apart for the reception of patients suffering with contagious disease, or who must for any cause be kept from contact with others in the hospital.—Police-jury ward, in Louisiana, the chief subdivision of the parish.—Watch and ward. See watch.

ward<sup>3</sup>, adv. [< ME. ward, a quasi-adverb, being the suffix -ward separated from its base, as in to me ward. See -ward and toward.] The suffix -ward separated as a distinct word.

-ward (wârd). [*< ME. -ward, < AS. -ward =
OS. -ward = OFries. -ward = D. -waart = MLG.*

LG. -ward = OHG. MHG. -wert (G. -wärts) = Icel. -verðir = Goth. -wairthis: akin to L. versus (**vert-tus*), which is postposed in the same way, < vertire, turn, become, = AS. weorðan, become: see ward<sup>1</sup> and ward<sup>2</sup>. Cf. -wards.]
A suffix of Anglo-Saxon origin, indicating direction or tendency to or from a point. It is affixed to many adverbs and prepositions, as fore (for-),
forth, from (fr-), to, after, back, hind, in, out, hither, thither, whither, up, neath, thence, etc.; to nouns indicating points of the compass (east, west, etc.); to nouns indicating a goal, center, end, direction, etc., as home, way, wind, down, heaven, God, etc. With some of these it was used pleonastically, as abackward, adownward. Most of the forms have a collateral form with adverbial genitive
-s, as *forward*s, *afterward*s, *inward*s, *outward*s, etc. In toward, the elements were formerly often separated, as in the Bible: to us-ward (Ps. xl. 5; 2 Pet. iii. 9); to thee-ward (1 Sam. xix. 4); to you-ward (2 Cor. xiii. 3); to the mercy seatward (Ex. xxxvii. 9); etc.

Such a newe heite and lusty courage unto the lawe wardcanst thou neuer come by of thine owne strength and enforcement. J. Udall, Prod. to Romans.

4. In Connecticut boroughs, the chief executive officer of the municipal government; in a few Rhode Island towns, a judicial officer. In colonial times the name was sometimes used in place of fire-warden or fire-ward.—Port warden, an officer invested with the chief authority in a port.—

Warden of a church. See churchwarden.—Warden of a university, the master or president of a university.

Warden of the Cinque Ports, the governor of the havens called the Cinque Ports, and their dependencies, who has the authority of an admiral, and has power to hold a court of admiralty and courts of law and equity. See Cinque Ports, under enquire.—Warden of the marches.

See march<sup>1</sup>.—Warden of the mint. See mint<sup>1</sup>.—Warden of the stews, a town officer, one of several mentioned in the thirteenth century: apparently one who had charge of pens for cattle, hogs, etc., perhaps a pound. Compare hog-mace.

warden<sup>2</sup> (wâr'dn), n. [*< ME. wardun, wardone; usually associated with warden<sup>1</sup>, and taken to mean a pear that may be kept long (cf. OF.
poire de garde, "a warden, or winter pear, a pear which may be kept verie long," Cotgrave):*

from red to dark brown, and approaching black, produced by the chemist J. F. Böttger about 1710. In the course of his experiments in the search for porcelain: (b) The first real or kaolin porcelain produced in Europe: it was first made by Böttger about 1710. Bristol Delft ware, an enameled pottery made at Bristol throughout the eighteenth century, especially a highly decorated ware in which landscapes, figure subjects, etc., covering the whole dish, bottom and marly alike, and plates or dishes closely imitated from Chinese enameled porcelain, are included. This decorative Delft has not been manufactured since 1788. See Delft.

Bristolware, same as above glazed ware. — Caffagiolo ware, a variety of the Italian enameled and painted earthenware known as majolica. It was made in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries at a factory, belonging to the family of the Medici in the village of Caffagiolo, on the road between Florence and Bologna. The name is also spelled, according to the irregular orthography of the time, Caffagiolo, Caffagiolo, Caffagiolo, Caffagiolo. The marks of this factory are much varied, but generally include the words in Caffagiolo variously spelled. A characteristic mark of these wares is the free use of a dark but extremely brilliant blue often in large masses, also a brilliant but opaque orange, and an opaque Indian red. Metallic luster was early used at Caffagiolo. — Canton lacquer-ware. See lacquer-ware. — Cashan ware. Same as Kashan ware. — Castelli ware, pottery made at Castelli, in eastern Italy; specifically, an enameled and richly decorated pottery made during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and even later. This magnificent ware preserves some of the characteristics of majolica, but is more pictorial in its decoration, being painted with landscapes, mythological scenes, etc. The colors are often heightened with gold. — Cologne ware, a name commonly given to the hard stoneware of which ornamental jugs, tankards, etc., were made, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and formerly called gres de Plandres. The city of Cologne was the chief seat of this manufacture. Compare gres de Plandres (under gres) and stoneware. — Combed ware. See comb. — Coralline ware. See coralline. — Cracked ware. See cracked. — Cream-colored ware, pottery or stoneware having a cream-colored paste; specifically, a variety of the fine tableware made by Wedgwood in the latter part of the eighteenth century. This ware was afterward called queen's-ware, from the supposed preference of Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. The cream-colored ware or queen's-ware made by other potters was copied closely from that of Wedgwood. — Crystalline ware. See crystalline. — Cullen ware, Cologne ware. — Delft ware. (a) Pottery made in and near the town of Delft in Holland; specifically, pieces for table use, and decorated vases for the mold from within, and worked over with a sponge so as to give it the required thickness and a smooth inner surface. — Incised ware, pottery decorated by scratches upon the surface. Specifically—(a) A coarse earthenware covered with an outer coat of a different color, which, being deeply scratched, shows the body of the ware. (b) A kind of pottery in which the body is scratched or scored, the whole being then covered with a transparent glaze, which shows a deeper color where it fills these incisions than elsewhere. — India ware, a name inaccurately given in England to the more common varieties of Chinese and Japanese porcelains imported into Europe by the East India Company or otherwise. — Kashee ware, a fine ceramic ware made in Persia, and decorated in blue on white in a manner closely resembling Chinese porcelain. It is apparently a mixed or hybrid porcelain, as it is softer than Oriental porcelain, and evidently different from the soft or tender porcelain of Europe. Also called Kashan, Cashan, and Kachy ware. — Kioto ware, ceramic ware made in or near the city of Kioto in Japan. Immense quantities of pottery and porcelain are made there, and many characteristic varieties are imitated with great success; but the name is given especially to a hard yellow ware with cracked glaze peculiar to Japan. — Lapis-lazuli ware. See lapis. — Lava ware. See lava. — Old Fulham ware, a name given to the English imitations of German gres cérame or hard stoneware made at Fulham from about 1670. — Palissy ware, a peculiar kind of pottery, remarkable for its beautiful glaze, the ornamentation being in very high relief, and consisting frequently of models of fish, reptiles, shells, or leaves. Bernard Palissy, a French potter of the sixteenth century, was the designer of this ware, and the art of manufacturing it died with him, all attempts to imitate it having failed. — Pebble ware. See pebbleware. — Persian ware. See Persian. — Plated ware. See plated. — Plumbeous ware, lead-glazed pottery. — Porphyry ware, a variety of pebbleware. The name is generally given to that variety which is speckled red and black. — Raphael ware, an old name for Italian majolica, taken from the occasional appearance of designs by Raphael, or ascribed to him, painted on majolica plates of a late period, or perhaps, in some cases, from the use of arabesques similar to those painted under Raphael's direction in the Loggia of the Vatican and elsewhere. — Red porphyry ware, a variety of pebbleware. The name is generally given to pieces which are speckled red and white. — Robbia ware. Same as Della Robbia ware. — Roman red ware. Same as Samian ware. — Rustic, Salopian, Samian, sanitary ware. See the adjectives. — Satsuma ware. (a) Pottery made in the province of Satsuma, in the island of Kiusiu, Japan. It has an extremely hard paste, is pale-yellow or brownish-yellow in color, and is covered with a very minute crackle. (b) A pottery made at Stoke-upon-Trent in England, imitated in the main from the Japanese Satsuma. — Serpentine, Sevillan, sigillated, silicon ware. See the qualifying words. — Sinceny ware, an enameled pottery made in Sinceny, in the department of the Aisne, France, decorated with great taste and delicacy, in partial imitation of Rouen ware and later of Chinese ceramic painting, and also in various fantastic styles. — Small ware or wares, textile articles of the tape kind, as narrow bindings of cotton, linen, silk, or woolen fabric; plaited sash-cord, braid, etc.; also, buttons, hooks, eyes, and other dress-trimmings; hence, trifles.

Every one knows Grubstreet is a market for small ware in wit. Swift, To a Young Poet.

Stamped ware. Same as sigillated ware. — Stanniferous ware, earthenware coated with an enamel of which tin is a principal ingredient. This enamel is used for fine wares, such as Delft. — Tinned, tortoise-shell, Umbrian ware. See the adjectives. — Tunbridge ware, a species of inlaid or mosaic work in wood. It derives its name from the place of manufacture, Tunbridge in England. — Verd antique ware, a variety of pebbleware, generally veined with dark green, gray, and black. — Wedgwood ware [named after Josiah Wedgwood (1730-95), the inventor, born in Staffordshire, England], a superior kind of semi-vitrified pottery, without much superficial glaze, and capable of taking on the most brilliant and delicate colors produced by fused metallic oxides and others. It is much used for ornamental ware, as vases, etc., and, owing to its hardness and property of resisting the action of all corrosive substances, for mortars in the laboratory. — Welsh ware, a pottery made at Islesworth, near London in England, from about 1825; a strong and solid earthenware of yellowish-brown color with a transparent glaze. = Syn. Merchandise, etc. See property.

ware<sup>2</sup> (wâr), v. t.; pret. and pp. wared, ppr. wareing. [Also waïr; < ME. waren (also be-waren), sell; cf. ware<sup>2</sup>, n.] To use; employ; lay out; expend; spend. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

warega-fly (wâr'gâ-flî), n. [< S. Amer. Ind. warega + E. fly.] An undetermined muscid fly occurring in Brazil, which is said to lay its eggs in the skin of man and animals, causing large swellings inhabited by the larva. E. Smith, Trans. Entom. Soc., London, 1868.

ware-goose (wâr'gôs), n. [< ware<sup>3</sup> + goose.] The Brent-goose; so called from feeding on ware or seaweed. [Local, Eng.]

warehouse (wâr'hous), n. [< ware<sup>2</sup> + house.] A house in which wares or goods are kept; a storehouse.

Th' unsuttled kingdom of swift Aeolus,
Great Ware-house of the Windes, whose traffick giues Motion of life to ev'ry thing that liues.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

Specifically—(a) A store in which goods are placed for safe-keeping; a building for the temporary deposit of goods for a compensation. (b) A building for storing imported goods on which customs dues have not been paid. (c) A store for the sale of goods at wholesale; also, often, a large retail establishment. — Bonded, Italian, etc., warehouse. See the adjectives.

warehouse (wâr'hous), v. t.; pret. and pp. warehoused, ppr. warehousing. [< warehouse, n.] To deposit or secure in a warehouse; specifically, to place in the government or custom-house stores, to be kept until duties are paid.

Only half the duty was to be paid at once, on warehousing the pepper in a warehouse approved by the customs. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 76.

warehouseman (wâr'hous-man), n.; pl. warehousemen (-men). 1. One who keeps a warehouse. — 2. One who is employed in or has charge of a warehouse. — Italian-warehouseman. See Italian. — Warehousemen's itch, a form of eczema of the hands, supposed to be caused by the irritation of sugar; grocers' itch.

warehousing (wâr'hou'sing), n. 1. The act of placing goods in a warehouse. — 2. The business of receiving goods for storage. — Warehousing system, a customs regulation by which imported articles may be lodged in public or bonded warehouses at a reasonable rent, without payment of the duties on importation until they are withdrawn for home consumption, thus lessening the pressure of the duties which otherwise would bear heavily on the merchant and cripple his purchasing power. If they are reexported no duty is charged. This system affords valuable facilities to trade, and is beneficial to the consumer and ultimately to the public revenue.

wareinet, n. A Middle English spelling of warren.

domestic interiors. Pottery has been made in this place from ancient times, and dated pieces exist as old as the beginning of the sixteenth century; but the importation from China and Japan of Oriental porcelain stimulated the decorators of later times, so that the richest pieces are of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. (b) A name given in England to vessels of pottery for domestic use, especially for table service. It is common to discriminate pottery from porcelain by the name Delft or Delft, and also Delft-china, etc. — Della Robbia wares. (a) A name given to a class of pottery used for works of art in relief and in the round; generally asserted to have been invented by Luca della Robbia in the fifteenth century. It has a hard and well-baked body of brown terra-cotta, upon which a white stanniferous enamel is applied. This is in some cases left white, or white with a background of blue; in others, all parts of the composition are richly decorated with color, especially green, yellow, and purple or maroon. The largest and most elaborate works in Della Robbia ware were made after Luca's death, the most important of all being, perhaps, the frieze on the hospital at Pistoia. Central Italy abounds in the productions of this school of artists, including tabernacles or shrines decorated with sacred subjects, altar-pieces in bas-relief and alto-relief, architectural ornaments, and fountains or lavabos in sacristies of churches and convents. (b) A fine terra-cotta, enameled in colors, made in England for architectural decorations, flower-vases, garden-seats, etc., especially that made at Tanworth at works founded in 1847. — Double-glazed ware, stoneware to which a glaze is applied in liquid form, both inside and outside, before it is fired. Also called Bristol ware. — Egyptian black ware, Egyptian ware. See Egyptian. — Etruscan ware. See Etruscan. — Faenza ware, a name formerly given to Italian majolica. *J. C. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 430.

A warp of weeks, four weeks; a month. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Cerdicus . . . was the first May-lord or captain of the Morris-dance that on those embowered shelves stamp his footing, where cods and dog-fish swomme not a warp of weeks forerunning. Nashie, Leuten Stuffs. (Darvies.)

To part a warp. Same as to part a line (which see, under line).—Warp-dyeing machine, an apparatus for drawing warp-threads, laid out in sets, through a dye-beck. Each warp is separated from the next by a pin, and the set is passed through the dye between rollers, and delivered from between squeezing-cylinders, which press out the superfluous dye. E. H. Knight.

warpage (wâr'paj), n. [warp + -age.] The act of warping; also, a charge per ton made on shipping in some harbors.

war-paint (wâr'pânt), n. 1. Among some savage tribes, paint applied to the face and other parts of the person, according to a recognized and traditional system, as a sign that the wearer is about to engage in war. Its origin may have been an attempt to strike terror to the mind of the enemy.

The war-paint on the Sachem's face,
Unwet with tears, shone fierce and red.

Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, iii.

2. Hence, full dress and adornment; official costume. [Slang.]

war-path (wâr'pâth), n. Among the American Indians, the path or route followed by a warlike expedition; also, the military undertaking itself. To go on the war-path, to go to war.

"The warrior whose eye is open can see his enemy," said Magua. . . . "I have brought gifts to my brother. His nation would not go on the war-path, because they did not think it well."

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xxviii.

warp-beam (wâr'p'bēm), n. In a loom, the roller on which the warp-threads are wound, and from which they are drawn as the weaving proceeds. It is placed at the back, opposite the cloth-beam, which receives the finished fabric. E. H. Knight.

warp-dresser (wâr'p'dres'er), n. In weaving, a machine for treating yarns with size before winding them on the yarn-beam of a loom. It is superseded in some mills by the larger machine called a slasher. E. H. Knight.

warper (wâr'për), n. [warp + -er.] 1. A weaver.—2. One who winds yarn in preparation for weaving, to form the warp of a web.—3. A warping-machine.

warp-frame (wâr'p'frām), n. In lace-manuf., a machine employing a thread for each needle, the threads being wound on a beam like the warp-beam of a loom (whence the name). Also called warp-net frame.
